Cedar police chief charged with DUI

CEDAR CITY — Cedar City Police Chief Glen Miller has been charged with drunk driving in a citation issued almost two weeks after he was involved in a traffic accident.

The citation and summons were issued by the Salt Lake District Attorney's Office, which is prosecuting the case at the behest of Iron County officials. Deputy District Attorney Kent Morgan said the two-week delay resulted from him not wanting to overlook anything.

Officials have declined to release information regarding the chief's blood-alcohol content. Shortly after the July 26 accident, Utah Highway Patrol Lt. Clayton Allred said it exceeded .08 percent, the legal limit for a Utah driver. Miller has been summoned to appear in court Aug. 25. He will not be arrested unless he misses the court appearance.

According to the UHP, Miller failed two alcohol tests.

Nevada will begin tuition program

CARSON CITY — Nevada parents will have a new college-savings option to consider this spring.

The state treasurer's office has entered the business of helping parents save for their children's college bills, a trend that's gaining in popularity across the country.

Details of the Nevada Higher Education Tuition Trust Fund have yet to be worked out, but state Treasurer Bob Seale said his office is aiming for a spring deadline to open participation in the state's first prepaid tuition program.

Prepayment plans allow families to pick up the tab for college costs in advance, rather than paying off loans and interest afterward. The state-run programs allow families to defer federal income tax on earnings until money is withdrawn for college.

Welfare benefits cut in California

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Gov. Pete Wilson signed a new welfare law Monday that puts a five-year lifetime limit on benefits and requires recipients to earn their checks.

The compromise was drafted by a committee of four lawmakers after Wilson vetoed a much more liberal version favored by the Democrat-controlled legislature.

"By enacting this law, we will be freeing hundreds of thousands of men, women and — most importantly — children from a system of dependency that for too long has destroyed hopes and stifled ambitions," said Wilson, a Republican.

In addition to the five-year lifetime limit, current recipients are limited to 24 consecutive months of aid, while new applicants are limited to 18 consecutive months.

Able-bodied recipients are required to work, perform community service, actively search for jobs or attend job training.

Elvis statuette 'cryin' all the time'

DEURNE, Netherlands — They say he loves them tender: A bust of Elvis Presley in this southeastern Dutch town reportedly is "weeping" salty tears for his fans.

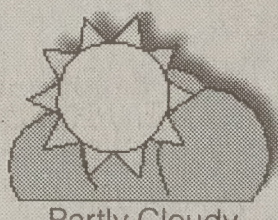

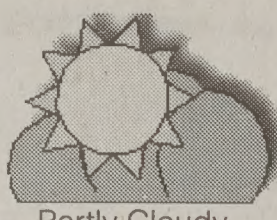

The white statuette, decked out in a fur-trimmed cloak and framed by two pink candles, started weeping last week, owner Toon Nieuwenhuis said in an interview that made front-page news Aug. 4 across the Netherlands.

Far from being all shook up about it, Nieuwenhuis has a simple explanation.

"He is crying for his fans all over the world. He knows how much they love him," Nieuwenhuis, an Elvis impersonator, said in an interview published in the Dutch daily De Telegraaf.

As for cynics who suggest the crying statue may be a publicity stunt, Nieuwenhuis says the tears have not dried up despite a Dutch heat wave and the bright lights of television cameras.

Scripture of the Day

"Yea, come unto Christ, and be perfected in him, and deny yourselves of all ungodliness; and if ye shall deny yourselves of all ungodliness, and love God with all your might, mind and strength, then is his grace sufficient for you, that by his grace ye may be perfect in Christ, ye can in nowise deny the power of God."

— Moroni 10:32

This is Adrian K. Klemme's favorite scripture because it "emphasizes to me the sacred mission of Jesus Christ and His Atonement. We can do many things to better ourselves but 'by the grace of God, ye are perfect in Christ.' This is the greatest blessing promised to us!"

Klemme is a junior from Boise, Idaho, majoring in international development.

Weekend Happenings

Compiled from staff and news service reports

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — A discount department store near a public housing project was looted and burned early Sunday after a white police officer shot and killed a black murder suspect during a fight.

A crowd of 200 to 300 people gathered. Some threw rocks and bottles at police after the shooting of Leon R. Fisher, of Nashville, at about 2:45 a.m.

About two hours later, a Dollar General Store was destroyed by fire. Nashville-based Dollar General Corp. said it built the store near the public housing project to give job opportunities to residents.

No one was reported hurt in the rioting or fire, and there were no immediate arrests.

Police and witnesses gave conflicting accounts of what happened. Witnesses said Fisher was handcuffed when he was shot and police waited before trying to resuscitate him. But police said Fisher was handcuffed after he was shot and officers immediately administered aid.

"Everybody's going to say (the officer) feared for his life," said Margaret Turner, who witnessed the shooting. It's hard to fear for your life when the man is handcuffed and he's badly beaten, she said.

At a news conference, Mayor Phil Bredesen defended Sgt. Randy Hickerson, who shot Fisher.

"I believe the officer did everything possible to resist using deadly force," he said. "There is no racial component to this at all."

Turner disputed that. She said officers waited before trying to revive Fisher, though she did not say how long.

She also said Fisher was handcuffed as he ran from Hickerson.

Another witness, Roxanne Williams, corroborated most of the police version, including that Fisher was not handcuffed until after he was shot. She said, though, that Fisher stopped fighting when he was sprayed, but Hickerson fired anyway.

Bredesen blamed the fire on people from outside the Settle Court neighborhood.

"This arson is not the work of residents of the area. We believe it was done by criminals and hoodlums who came back after the incident was over," he said.

ALGIERS, Algeria — A bomb hidden in a baby's bassinet and another village massacre have left 32 people dead in the latest violence in Algeria, hospital sources said Sunday.

The bomb exploded Friday afternoon in Djelfa, 185 miles south of Algiers, killing at least 11 people and wounding 20, hospital sources in the capital said on customary anonymity.

In the early morning hours Friday, an armed group entered the village of Zeboudja, 60 miles south of Algiers, roused people from their homes and slit the throats of 21.

About 20 others were shot and wounded, some when they tried to flee, rescuers said.

No one has claimed responsibility for either attack, but the independent Algerian newspapers Le Matin, Liberte and El Khabar Sunday all blamed Islamic militants.

Since June, when the newly elected government took power with promises to stamp out the violence in this North African nation, 750 people have been killed.

LONDON — Russians appear to be drinking themselves to death at a rate unequaled in modern times, researchers say.

A report in The Lancet medical journal said Russians' average life expectancy fell sharply between 1990 and 1994 — 6.2 years for men and 3.4 years for women.

"The magnitude and steepness of the fluctuations in mortality rates and life expectancy for Russia are without parallel in the modern era," the report in Saturday's issue said.

While nutrition and health care may be factors, "the evidence is that substantial changes in alcohol consumption over the period could plausibly explain the main features of the mortality fluctuations," it said.

A Russian-British research team based its findings on health statistics between 1984 and 1994. Russians' health has declined since the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, the report said.

LONDON — British and German researchers say they've made significant headway in understanding how brain cells die in people suffering from Huntington's chorea and two other degenerative brain diseases.

The findings of the researchers, published Monday in the journal, Cell, indicate that Huntington's chorea is caused by a buildup of proteins inside the cell, which eventually kills it.

A similar process may be at work in two other crippling brain disorders, Alzheimer's disease and Creutzfeld-Jakob disease.

Priority will now be given to screening for drugs that inhibit the protein buildup, The Daily Telegraph quoted one of the researchers as saying Monday.

"We all know what we think the primary event (cause) is, so we can start working on a cure, perhaps by stopping these aggregations from forming," said Gillian Bates, a doctor at Guy's Hospital in London.

Scientists found that symptoms of the disease developed within two months of introducing a specific protein into laboratory mice.

"This is a pretty big deal," said Dr. David Housman, a biology professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Cambridge, Mass.

"We have turned a corner from looking at genes to where we can begin developing real assays for drugs. If I were someone at risk for Huntington's disease this would be the biggest news I could imagine," said Housman, an expert on Huntington's disease.

based on inaccurate information and are incorrect," Simmons wrote the president.

Officials at Snake River and Democratic Rep. Charles Stenholm of Texas, who sponsored the legislation, agreed with Simmons' interpretation.

Simmons has acknowledged exceeding federal limits on campaign contributions and is the subject of a Justice Department inquiry.

He also has been working with farm cooperatives for three years to push for the tax deferral.

"The true losers will not be just the 2,000 families who make up the Snake River Sugar Cooperative, but the more than 2 million farmers the legislation would have the cooperative to refinance the venture and possibly money," said Allan Lipman of Snake River Sugar.

Instead, a misinformation made Simmons the bad guy.

"It's a better story to say a billionaire businessman than of farmers," Lipman said. Amalgamated producing 850,000 tons of sugar annually accounts for about 10 percent of sugar consumed nationally. The company has three plants in Idaho and Oregon.

"We were asking for the employees get when they're employed," Lipman can't they extend that to make them more competitive.

lack of support for Greenpeace means cutbacks

by LAURA PERRETT
Universe Staff Writer

Greenpeace International is reducing staff and budget. Budget cuts are being made because of financial realities of the times," Deborah Rephan, spokeswoman for Greenpeace International. Greenpeace has seen a downturn in donations and membership. "Unfortunately, we're not in a position to support our previous infrastructure. We're closing all field offices and consolidating most operations to our Washington D.C. headquarters," Rephan said. There will also be staff reductions within the campaigns, Rephan said. "We're doing this to remain strong in coming years to build back up our resources," she said. Because of budget and staff reductions, Greenpeace will limit the majority of its efforts to two issues. "Our primary priorities will be global warming and forest logging practices. However, to some degree, we'll work on everything we used to," Rephan said.

To study the impact of global warming, the Arctic Sunrise is touring Alaska and the western Arctic Ocean, Rephan said. "We've been to Antarctica and documented the effects of global warming. Now we're in the Arctic, photographing and documenting the impacts of global warming on human beings and animals." "We've confirmed and documented that the most intense impacts of global warming will be felt in both global regions." Rephan said Greenpeace is studying the industries that contribute most to global warming, especially the oil industry. Other focuses of Greenpeace are toxic campaigns, a nuclear campaign and protecting bio-diversity. Greenpeace specifically lost supporters because of its strong opposition toward the Gulf War. "We believe it was a war over resources, over oil. We believe the oil industry is extremely polluting and contributes most to global warming," Rephan said. "There were alternatives. No human being should die for a resource that's polluting and not needed."

Firefighters resign over charges of harassment

Associated Press

WASHINGTON TERRACE, — Fire Chief Rob Herndon said two other male firefighters resigned amid sexual harassment charges leveled by a teen-volunteer.

Mayor Brad Dee accepted Herndon's resignation, along with that of Capt. Harlow Pickett and firefighter Brent Keyes. Dee, however, denies any sexual harassment took place.

Dee just found it was within the interest of the city that we had our resignations in," Herndon said Friday. "It was very difficult. This is seven years of my life that I'm giving up."

Dee said an internal investigation revealed that sexually explicit photographs and sounds had been downloaded from the Internet onto the department's computer. The mayor claims the investigation was already underway when 19-year-old Elizabeth Hernandez complained about the dirty pictures and then filed a complaint with the Utah Labor Commission last May.

Dee has also determined that the sexual firefighters within the department administration used and viewed this material, Dee wrote.

Although he won't deny pornography was viewed on his department's computer, Herndon said he didn't participate.

Herndon felt compelled to step down, he said, "Because I didn't stand at the beginning."

Dee alleged that Herndon, Pickett, then-deputy-chief Keyes, and Sharon Byington and firefighter Hernandez sexually harassed her by downloading and viewing pornographic material in the presence.

Dee said the city's investigation revealed that the only time questionable materials were displayed in the presence were instances where she asked for help from a firefighter to help her download some for her own use, Dee said.

Dee disputed that statement Friday, saying, "I was severely harassed."

Between December and January, she said, "I remember being down there every day and being harassed or hearing it."

Dee said the material she said she downloaded was an attempt to delete several of the explicit images from the disk for her attorneys, she said.

Dee said the firefighters' actions broke the laws, the mayor told the Standard-Examiner Friday.

However, they were in violation of the city's policy on sexual harassment and sexually-oriented material.

"I'll discipline for department policy violations, but no criminal laws were broken," he said.

Herndon re-iterated that there were never any sexual harassment.

Dee said it is something that I'll stick with for the rest of my life," he said. "The stories that she has told are false and are tearing me up."

Dee said she still wants the two men she named in her lawsuit to resign. Dee said they remain with the department because the investigation revealed a level of participation in the harassment that did not warrant their resignations.

Five of those named have been reprimanded once, and Herndon will receive a second reprimand and two weeks off without pay.

Hernandez will receive a letter of reprimand, Dee said.

Dee said she still plans to file a harassment lawsuit, although her complaint with the Utah Labor Commission's Anti-Discrimination Division is still in the investigative stages.

Washington Terrace city official met with Cook and her attorney last week for an Anti-Discrimination Division settlement conference, which proved unsuccessful.

Currently on a six-month leave of absence, Cook has said she will return to her volunteer position if the five firefighters do not resign.

CES Symposium gives instruction on meeting students' special needs

By SPENCER WARD
Universe Staff Writer

This week's Church Education System symposiums will provide information for seminary teachers to help teach special needs seminary students.

The symposiums are just a small part of the Special Needs Program CES uses to reach out to these students.

Special needs students are those that have learning disabilities, physical handicaps or underdeveloped social skills, but they want to participate in the seminary program.

"These [symposiums] are for people coming from all circumstances who want to come and learn what they can do for special needs seminary students," said Michael B. Roberts, special needs coordinator for the Utah Valley South area.

The focus of this week's Special Needs training is to help teachers know what resources are available to teach the special needs students, Roberts said.

Resources for students who are sight or hearing impaired, mobility impaired or who have learning disabilities are available.

There are also multi-lingual resources, which is an "ever-increasing issue in a global church," Roberts said. "The youth get tossed into a melting pot and they might not have the English skills they need. We want the teachers to know what to do to obtain manuals to help these youth."

The symposium will also help teachers know what to do to create or utilize existing priesthood, faculty and area councils to help all special needs students, Roberts said.

Additional help for special needs students has been obtained with a recent change in curriculum.

This change will allow seminary teachers to better mainstream these special needs seminary students, said Michael B. Roberts, special needs coordinator for the Salt Lake East area.

"CES intranet will offer information to teachers who can just click on the special needs icon," Hanna said. "This will help teachers with students who are deaf, blind, or have learning disabilities."

The CES will also put manuals on tape to make it easier for all seminary students, especially those with disabilities, or those that live in the "hinterland," Hanna said.

A peer program is also operating within the seminary program to allow students with disabilities to remain in class with all seminary students.

"This program is for kids that struggle, but want to be in seminary. You get a peer with a special needs student and then teach at a level so all can understand," Hanna said.

The peer classes and the buddy system have been effective in integrating the special needs students, Hanna said.

"We have sterling scholars with special needs students, and it works incredibly," she said.

Teachers know they can count on the peers to help the students with special needs; the peer student help them feel accepted and help them with the other things they might need, Hanna said.

At the end of the year, the seminary program sponsors a scripture chase. The team of special needs students with their peers always wins, Hanna said. "That helps to humble the other students," she said.

Another benefit of the peer program is that no student feels alone.

The special needs students and peers get to be great friends. They sit by each other at the assemblies, and the special needs students feel they belong in other classes, Hanna said. "All are together in this, no one is unwanted. That is the feeling in the special needs program," she said.

This program has been "just wonderful," Hanna said. "You see a world of difference in the attitude of the friends."

They learn how to help others, and they have a lot more experience they can use as they go on to serve missions and in life."

Hanna said a teacher found out that a student in Salt Lake City who was disturbing classes was having difficulty reading.

The teacher did some adapting to help the student, and he just graduated this May. At graduation, this student was asked what he planned to do in the next year. "Go on a mission, of course," was his reply.

"That's the difference you see when you deal with their needs," Hanna said. "The teachers learn to modify their program to help students."

The goal in the special needs seminary program is total integration, Hanna said.

"This program is most rewarding. You look at those students as seminary students and children of God first, with the disability last," she said.

For severely handicapped children that cannot be mainstreamed, the Provo Special Education Seminary has classes with only three to four students, Roberts said.

The Special Needs Program also reaches out to youth in detention centers and also at the Eastwood State Mental Hospital in Provo.

"There is not a ready peer support group for all of these programs. We look to the community, and particularly to BYU for peer support help," Roberts said.

"Regardless of the level of social or educational growth, special needs students need to feel they are a contributing part of society at large," Roberts said. "They need to be a part of our world, and us a part of theirs."

Fred Oliver, principal of the Provo Special Education Seminary, trains part-time teachers and volunteers to help the special needs students.

Individuals wishing to know more about the Special Needs Program may attend the Teaching Fair tomorrow from 4 to 8 p.m. in the ELWC ballroom or contact Oliver at (801) 370-6889.

Graduating from seminary requires time, sacrifice

By BRADLEY S. RICHARDSON
Universe Staff Writer

For many students, early morning seminary brings memories of rolling out of bed at 5 or 6 a.m. and racing to the local church.

However, both early morning and released-time seminary require sacrifice, said Tom Tyler, zone administrator for the Church Education System.

"Attending any kind of seminary requires commitment and sacrifice on the part of the student," Tyler said.

"With early morning students, they get up early, while students taking released time at high school may take (fewer) elective courses," he said.

Early morning seminary started in 1951.

"It was started in southern California to meet the request of priesthood leaders who felt keenly the need to have a similar experience as youth in Utah," Tyler said. "There weren't enough students in other places to start released-time seminary in that time period, so the early morning approach met the need."

Early morning seminary is typically implemented outside of Utah. However, released-time seminary is available in parts of Arizona, Utah, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, Colorado and Alberta, Canada.

"We offer released time where there are at least 100 students at a given high school, and secondly where local school boards approve it and when approved by the Church Board of Education," Tyler said.

This year the Church Education System is changing the rotation of the seminary's study of the standard works. The rotation of Old Testament, New Testament, Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants will be

NOT JUST FOR EARLY BIRDS: For over 35 years, seminary buildings like this one in Provo have been getting young people out of bed and into the scriptures.

UPS strike declared no emergency by Clinton

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — After a week of keeping its distance from the Teamsters strike against UPS, the Clinton administration stepped into the fray Monday. Labor Secretary Alexis Herman called on both sides to meet with her and find a way to get "back to the bargaining table."

Federally mediated talks broke off Saturday and sent the strike that is crippling the nation's busy package delivery system into a second week with little sign either side will budge.

President Clinton has been following the strike, Herman said Sunday, "But we don't believe that this situation has reached the state of what we define as a national emergency."

But early Monday, she said in a statement, "I've asked the leaders of the Teamsters union and the United Parcel Service to meet with me today at the Labor Department and they have both agreed. I intend to talk with each party individually to find out what it will take to move these talks forward and to urge greater flexibility and a willingness to compromise to get back to the bargaining table."

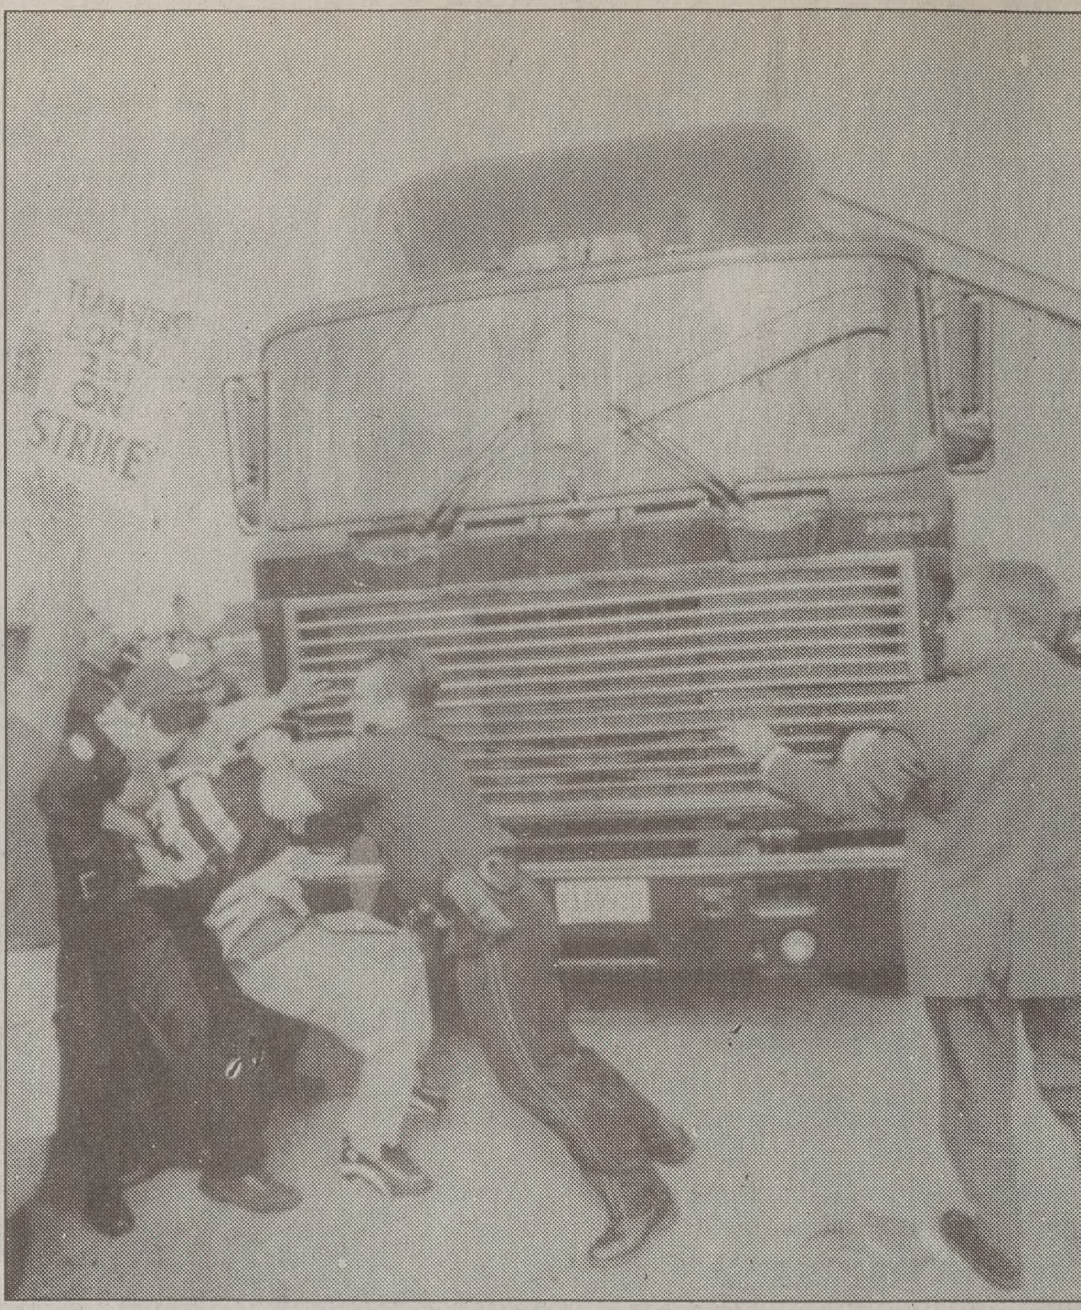

Herman told NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday, "The president recognizes that these are serious issues: the nature of part-time work, pension protection for American workers. These are all issues that we care about."

The issue of striker replacement has threatened to escalate tensions.

"I can't promise anything," UPS Vice Chairman John Alden said Monday on ABC's "Good Morning America" when asked if UPS would hire replacements for strikers. "Right now we have no plans to hire people. We would like our people to come back to work. I can't promise what the future will bring."

Herman had cautioned the parties not to "escalate this strike" and said hiring replacements for the 185,000 striking union members "does contribute to that escalation."

"I think he would have a problem" if the company did hire replacements, Teamsters President Ron Carey said on CBS Sunday. He did not elaborate.

"I'm convinced that there is still room here for a settlement," Herman said Sunday. "If they will redouble their efforts and commit to taking these issues back to the bargaining table, we can settle this strike."

UPS also faces problems with its pilots, who voted this spring to authorize their own strike unless they get an acceptable contract. Negotiations between the company and its in-house pilots union broke off in June and could resume later this month.

The pilots, who have honored the Teamsters picket lines, are seeking to raise average salaries to between $120,000 and $130,000 from about $102,000.

In Nashville, Tenn., Monday a UPS tractor-trailer ran off an overpass and fell about 25 feet onto Interstate 65, killing the driver. UPS officials at the scene would not comment on whether the unidentified driver was a replacement brought in because of the strike.

In another development, UPS manager William Perry testified in federal court in Boston that he had been harassed and threatened by workers picketing the company as he tried to deliver packages. Perry, who returned to a job he held 20 years ago as a driver, said he was called a scab and "every other type of obscenity" as he tried to get his truck in and out of the UPS plant in Somerville, Mass.

UPS handles 12 million parcels and letters daily. The work stoppage's damage to small businesses operations throughout the country has governors and business leaders clamoring for White House intervention.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act, the president must determine that the nation's safety and health is imperiled before he can intervene to force an end to the walkout. Herman said the administration is sensitive to the plight of small businesses and is monitoring the strike's impact on the economy.

"The question of Taft-Hartley ... is one that seems to me lies in the future, not now," Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin said in analyzing the strike's economic implications.

Gingrich to speak in Utah

House Speaker still resilient after Cook's remarks

Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY — House Speaker Newt Gingrich will speak to a national veterans convention in Utah Aug. 20.

Gingrich will also meet with organizers of the 2002 Winter Games and may use the trip to show all-is-well with freshman Rep. Merrill Cook, R-Utah, who made some impolitic remarks about the embattled speaker to a local group of editors earlier this week.

Cook told the Deseret News editorial board that he did not think Gingrich would have the support for another two years as speaker if the 1998 elections leave the GOP's 20-seat House majority intact. Cook added that Gingrich's one-time lieutenant, Rep. Bill Paxon, might be a more popular choice for the job.

Cook didn't waste much time trying to extract his foot.

"To anyone who might be confused by a recent story ... regarding the House speaker, I would like to distinguish my hypothetical discussion ... from reality," Cook wrote Friday.

"In theory, it is possible someone else will be elected speaker in 1999. Fact: the smart money and I are betting that Newt Gingrich will remain speaker this year, next year and beyond."

Gingrich, who last month barely survived a House uprising purportedly planned and executed by some of his most trusted colleagues, has seen the wave he rode to Republican dominance in 1994 break on the rocks. He has been at the forefront of a number of gaffes and controversies, ranging from his blink-first government shutdown showdown with President Clinton in 1995 to acknowledging this year that he violated House ethics, for which he was fined $300,000.

None of Utah's three House members were involved in the overthrow plot, although Cook came in close proximity since one of the rebel leaders — Rep. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C. — held ouster meetings at his office, next door to Cook's.

Cook has joked that had he known he might have held his ear to the wall, but insists seriously that he is loyal to Gingrich.

"I have been one of the speaker's strongest supporters from my first day in Congress ... I voted for Mr. Gingrich as speaker this year and I expect to vote for him again in 1999."

Gingrich last came to Utah in October to stump for Cook and Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah.

Come Aug. 20, Cook said, he and Gingrich will stand "shoulder-to-shoulder" as Gingrich appears to speak to the Veterans of Foreign Wars convention in Salt Lake City.

And Gingrich is slated to come back in late August or September as part of a tour of the western United States which he will attend and h Gov. Mike Leavitt and fellow Jim Hansen and Chris C attend as well — will be the focus of Gingrich's visit.

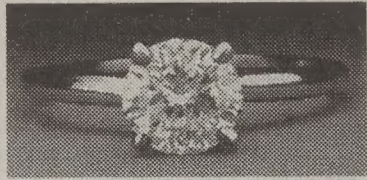

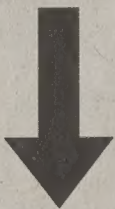

being organized for congressional leaders by the Western Coalition, co-founded by former Reps. Met Johnson and R. now state C man.

Cook is er's host for 20 visit and is handling media arrangements for the trip. Gingrich's office cannot have badly bruised.

After the tion, Gingrich attend a brief Salt Lake Organizing officials from Dave Johnson, Crabtree and Flint.

Cook's Olympic disc which he will attend and h Gov. Mike Leavitt and fellow Jim Hansen and Chris C attend as well — will be the focus of Gingrich's visit.

Passenger trains slow down to 20 mph, flash-flood situations too dangerous

Associated Press

MAN, Ariz. — An Amtrak passenger train that injured 116 people on Saturday set a new speed limit for one of the nation's two largest rail networks, slowing trains to a crawl in areas where flash floods are common.

The bridge, spanning the usually dry Colorado River, appeared to be damaged by the Chicago-bound Southwest Chief passenger train as it crossed the buckled rail at 90 mph on Saturday. The car was carrying 116 passengers.

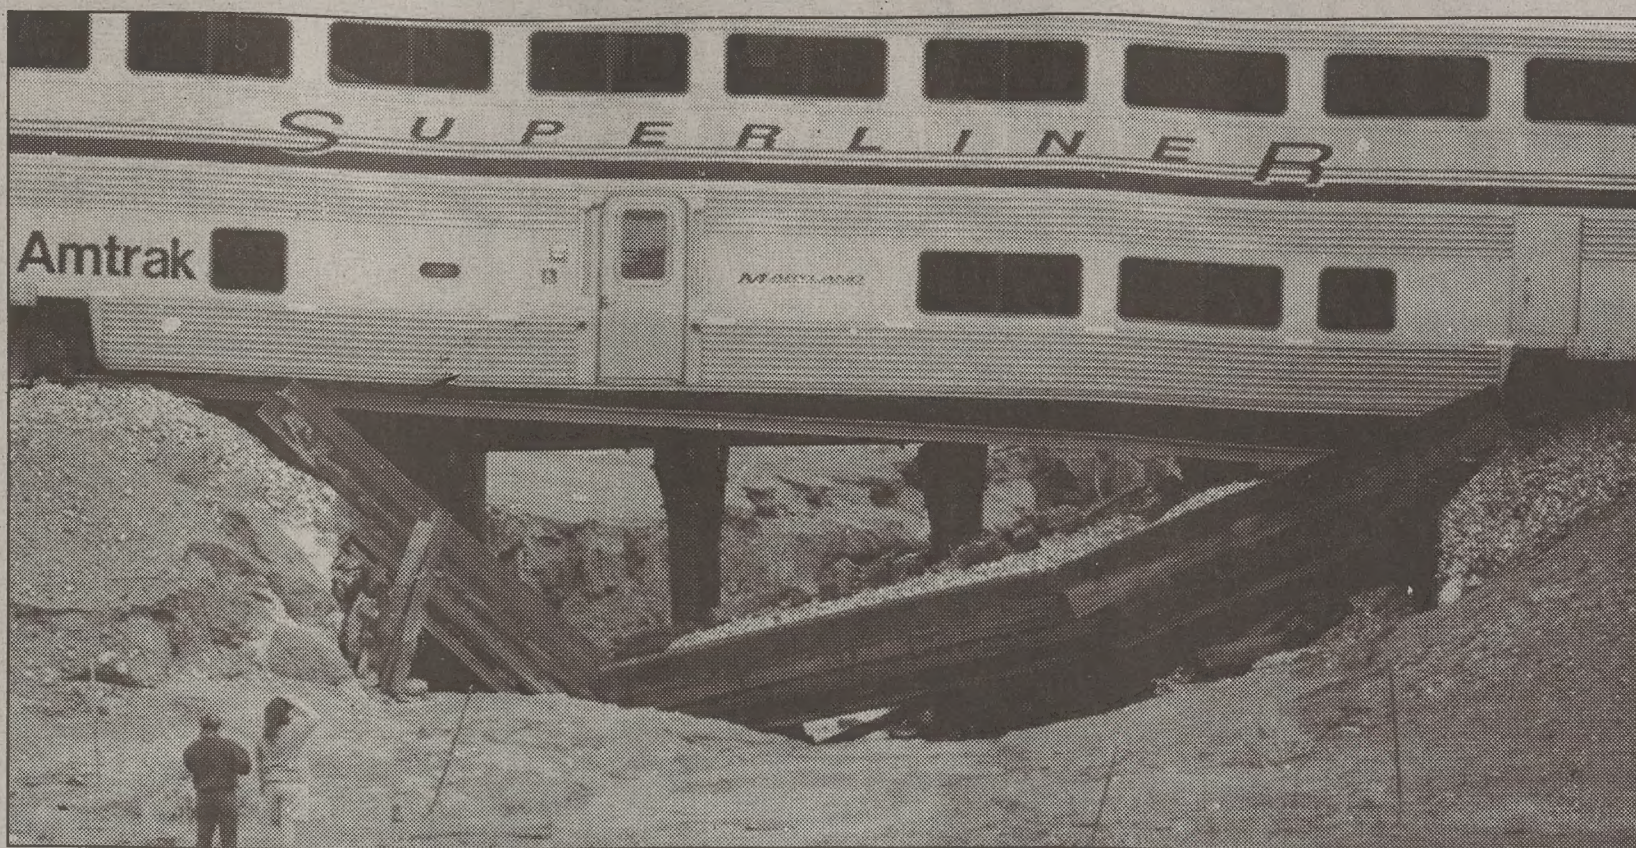

A federal inspector had checked the line earlier and found no problems. Investigators were leaning toward flash floods as the cause of the accident.

The Federal Railroad Administration Northern-Santa Fe division immediately imposed the speed limit on all 33,000 miles of its tracks in areas where flash floods are in effect.

The company will permit its freight trains to travel only 40 mph at such locations, said Jim Hall, chairman of the Federal Transportation Safety Board. Passenger trains will be limited to travel only 20 mph.

The board announced the voluntary rule, which applies only to the Burlington Northern Santa Fe line that stretches from Canada to Mexico, with track in the Southwest, West and Southeast.

minor injuries. Thirteen people remained hospitalized Sunday night, including a man with back injuries in critical but stable condition.

Hall said on Sunday that the train engineer and assistant engineer both saw a dip in the track right before the engine hit the buckled rail.

Passenger Joseph Matthews, who had just left his home in Long Beach, Calif., for a train tour of the United States, said the derailment felt like an amusement park ride.

"I was screaming and yelling — kind of like when you're bungee jumping," said Matthews, who was typing on his laptop computer when the train derailed.

IRA-allied groups call for more public support, Northern Ireland prepares for talks with Britain

Associated Press

TEST, Northern Ireland — The Sinn Féin party has called for street demonstrations to back a negotiated end to the conflict and for a negotiated end to the conflict as Northern Ireland prepares for talks next month on its political future.

"It is a time for people power," said Sinn Féin legislator Caoimhghin O'Donnell at a rally in Belfast Sunday. "Tens of thousands of people have a duty and a right to remain on the streets, to campaign on all the issues which are at the heart of this conflict."

O Caolain was elected in June as the first representative of the modern Sinn Féin party in the Dail, the key law-making chamber of the Irish parliament.

He said the struggle to end British rule in Northern Ireland had entered a new phase, "a phase which is equally demanding of all of us."

About 3,000 IRA supporters took part in Sunday's annual march into downtown Belfast. The march marked the 1971 implementation of a British policy that resulted in the imprisonment of thousands of people suspected of IRA activities. The policy infuriated Catholics and boosted support for the IRA.

Britain stopped internment without trial in 1976 but IRA supporters continue to mark the anniversary of its introduction with a parade and rally.

Turnout was substantially smaller than in previous years and the mood was sober. Many grassroots IRA supporters are pessimistic about the outcome of the peace talks, scheduled to start Sept. 15, and many of the province's pro-British Protestant politicians have vowed to boycott the talks because of Sinn Féin's inclusion.

At the rally, O Caolain urged David Trimble, leader of the Ulster Unionists, Northern Ireland's main Protestant party, to take a seat at the talks.

"He has nothing to fear but fear itself. Not availing of that opportunity would represent a lack of courage," O Caolain said.

Sinn Féin leader Gerry Adams told a crowd in front of Belfast City Hall that his party would enter the talks as "the third-largest party in the occupied part of this island."

The IRA began the cease-fire in its campaign of violence against British rule in Northern Ireland on July 20.

SLC more pious than other cities

Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY — Salt Lake is something of a throwback to the medieval cities of Europe, which were organized around Roman Catholic cathedrals and bishops commanding religious and moral authority, according to a noted historian.

Jan Shippo, delivering the keynote address Saturday at this year's Sunstone Symposium, said Utah's capital — with its center being the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints' temple and its powerful prophet — represents a departure from the colonial American rejection of the European model.

American cities mostly base their urban centers on commerce, government and ports.

Shippo, an Indiana-based scholar of Mormonism, is just completing research comparing four American cities: Salt Lake City; Providence, R.I.; Lynchburg, Va.; and Indianapolis.

Providence was established by Roger Williams, who rejected the government monitoring of religion he saw in the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Williams wanted to create a "haven where civil and religious authority would be forever separate," Shippo said.

Today, nearly 85 percent of all Providence churchgoers are Catholics, and 71 percent of Rhode Island residents are Catholic.

But Bishop Louis Gelineau told Shippo that Catholicism there is "not a monolith."

A third are active members, a third are seen in church mainly at Christmas and Easter, and a third are "encrusted Catholics" who were probably baptized but play no part in Catholic community, Gelineau told Shippo.

In Lynchburg, Va., a third of the churchgoers are Baptists and 67.5 percent of the population claim some religious affiliation, a much higher percentage than most cities, Shippo said.

In Indianapolis, on the other hand, only 45 percent of the population call themselves churchgoers, and their numbers are dominated by mainstream Protestants.

Salt Lake City is unique among the four because it is among several cities in Salt Lake County, where 75 percent of the population are churchgoers, Shippo said.

The members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints who settled in the Salt Lake Valley were fleeing the chaos and power-sharing of modernity, she said, and wanted their Zion to be a heavenly village.

"They began by marking the spot where a temple would be built and then from this sacred center they laid out city streets, imposing order on the natural universe," Shippo said.

They named the streets, the most important waterway, the highest mountain peak and nearly everything else in sight, Shippo said.

"The church stationed itself at the pivot between nature and human authority by asserting control over the map," Shippo said.

She concluded with a comparison of Salt Lake City and Indianapolis.

"The Midwestern city was once foundering if not deep in sin, certainly in an absence of self-esteem," she said.

Indianapolis found redemption in sports.

The Indianapolis 500 auto race was moved from Monday to Sunday, a change that helped fill the stands. City leaders moved to make it the "amateur sports capital of the universe," and then "stole the (pro football) Colts from Baltimore."

"The arenas are full," Shippo said, "but the pews are empty."

This could be a cautionary note for Salt Lake City, which is hosting the 2002 Winter Olympics.

"Their coming will surely showcase Temple Square, Mormonism and family values," Shippo said.

"But such an event is bound to bring secularism in its train ... (and) carry forward the process of turning Salt Lake City into modern urban space."

"And modernity and rank secularism have a way of extending themselves indefinitely," she said.

When Shippo asked LDS Church President Gordon B. Hinckley in an interview for his position on bringing in the Olympics, he responded that his position did not matter.

"The Olympics are coming and (the church) will take advantage of it," Hinckley told her.

GRIM LIST: Relatives check the list of survivors of the Guam airplane crash after arriving at Korean Airlines in Seoul, South Korea. Korean Airlines Boeing 747 crashed in Guam early Wednesday. The National Transportation Safety Board is wrapping-up investigation at the crash site.

Investigation almost over, crash cause still unknown

Associated Press

AGANA, Guam — The investigation at the site of a Korean Air jet crash in Guam is nearly over, federal agents said Monday, and families prepared to take victims' bodies home to South Korea.

Investigators from the National Transportation Safety Board say they are months away from figuring out what caused Wednesday's crash, which killed 226 people. But they have found that an airport warning system that might have prevented the accident was not working at the time of the crash.

Much of the crash data already has been to Washington for analysis.

"Our operation here is winding down," said NTSB member George Black.

Workers also were trying to remove the remaining bodies from the crash site. So far, 162 complete remains and 41 partial remains have been recovered from the rocky hillside where the plane went down, Black said.

At least 19 bodies have been identified, said Clifford Guzman of the Guam Governor's Office. Officials earlier said 39 bodies had been identified, but Guzman said that number included victims whose families have not yet been notified or whose identity was only tentatively determined.

Arrangements were under way with the victims' families to send the identified bodies home. Guzman said that should start Tuesday.

The latest victim, 11-year-old Grace Chung of Marietta, Ga., died Sunday in San Antonio, where she was being treated for burns.

Investigators believe the pilot had full control of the jet when it crashed, and are looking for clues to explain why he was flying so low.

Investigators are still looking at whether all the pilot's instrumentation was working and what impact the driving rain may have had. They also are analyzing the flight's data and voice recordings.

The Federal Aviation Administration, meanwhile, was trying to figure out when the faulty system — the Radar Minimum Safe Altitude Warning System — should have alerted officials that Flight 801 was flying too close to the hillside.

The system normally issues an alert if a jet is flying too low, and officials on the ground inform the pilot. But federal investigators said Sunday that an error was inserted into the system's software during an overhaul.

Investigators say the mistake was not to blame for the crash, but a properly working system could have allowed air traffic controllers to direct the pilot of the Boeing 747 to pull the jumbo jet to a higher altitude as he approached Guam International Airport.

Civilian power plant may make weapons

Associated Press

SWEETWATER, Tenn. — Over the protests of anti-nuclear activists and concerned neighbors, the Department of Energy is seeking for the first time to use a civilian power plant to make tritium for nuclear weapons.

If the plan goes through as expected next month, it would violate a long-standing tenet that civilian nuclear power plants are not to be used to make weapons.

While opponents said the plan to make tritium — a radioactive form of hydrogen — violates nonproliferation treaties and makes the United States look foolish as it opposes other countries doing the same thing, Department of Energy officials said the project is simply a safe and necessary test.

The government's own reactors that could produce tritium are broken down, and buying tritium from other countries is not considered politically feasible. The government contemplated but ultimately rejected building a new reactor at a cost of at least $9 billion, The New York Times reported Monday.

"The point of the test is to provide confidence to the (Nuclear Regulatory Commission), utilities and to the public that making tritium in a light-water reactor is technically straightforward and safe," Energy project director Stephen Sohinki told about 100 people Thursday at what may be the only public hearing on the plan.

The only remaining step is the approval of the NRC, which is expected.

The plans call for the Energy Department to pay the Tennessee Valley Authority $7.5 million to do the test once at its Watts Bar Nuclear Plant in nearby Spring City.

The TVA plans to load four special lithium rods into its reactor, which will collect the naturally produced tritium.

Although the United States is reducing its weapons stockpile, the government contends a continuing supply of tritium is needed because the isotope loses its effectiveness quickly. Tritium decays at a rate of about 5.5 percent a year.

The United States has not produced tritium since 1988, and President Clinton has issued a directive to the Energy Department to find a new supply by 2005.

Speaker after speaker Thursday railed against the plan, asking why the United States needs more bomb components now that the Cold War is over. They also worried about radioactive releases into the Tennessee River and TVA's ability to secure Watts Bar, which cost $7 billion over 20 years and has been running for a little more than a year.

Ralph Hutchison, spokesperson for the Oak Ridge Environmental Peace Alliance, said this couldn't be done at a public utility, people wouldn't allow it.

TVA is a federally funded government corporation, unlike utilities that have publicly traded stock. Others said the plan violates the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 which forbids using civilian plants to make "special nuclear materials."

"You conspired to break the law," Jeannine Honicker, a 63-year-old anti-nuclear activist, told project director Sohinki.

Four men in custody following shooting

Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY — Four people are in custody following the shooting death of a State Street bus stop. Police believe the killing is gang-related.

Two adults and two teenagers were arrested following a one-hour chase early Saturday. Police, the Highway Patrol and the department helicopter were involved.

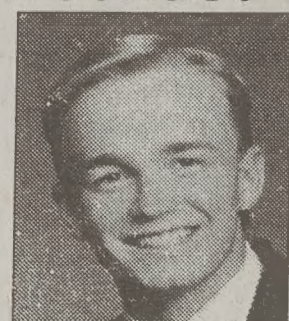

Killed was David Carr, who was shot once in the chest after a car full of men opened fire into a crowd at a stop. Salvador Velez, 20, a minor head wound, was treated and released from University Hospital.

The shooting followed a dispute between two groups, Kirk said, that involved the two victims doing something at the pickup truck.

"This was not a random shooting," said Kirk. "The two victims were involved in a dispute with the suspects, prior to the shooting."

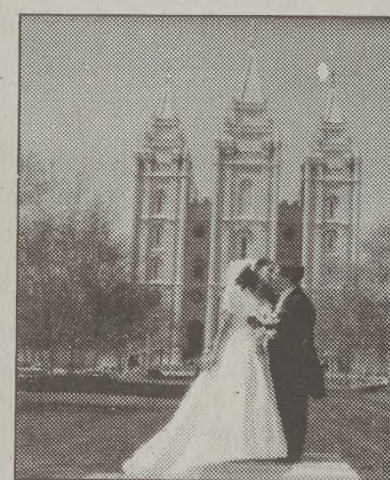

After the shots were fired, police talked to a group of people across the street from the shooting, Kirk said.

New policy benefit students

GRANT R. MADSEN
Universe Staff Writer

Sept. 2, students who are insured by another company required to enroll as contingents in the improved BYU health insurance plan. This means students will have to pay for insurance during the full year even if they are not attending during Spring and Summer Terms, said Ralph Simpson, BYU representative for the university's Health Plan, Deseret Mutual Benefit Administrators.

Simpson said year-round coverage is a plus because the health plan will cover students no matter where they go. Christensen, administrative director of the McDonald Health Center, said he feels the new plan will help students avoid excess debt. In the past, many students have had serious financial difficulties because of the break in service during the summer months, he said.

Simpson said, "Now students that pay for insurance during the Fall and Winter Semesters that then go home for the summer and get hurt will still be covered."

Because of the extra revenue that will be generated by those who pay their premium — money paid to the insurance company for coverage — without needing treatment during Spring and Summer Terms, BYU will be able to keep the cost of insurance down, Simpson said.

"It used to be that student insurance covered 80 percent of $25,000. Now it's 80 percent of $37,500. The students' benefits went up $10,000," he said.

"We never used to cover durable medical equipment. If you needed a knee brace or wheelchair — students used to have to pay for that themselves. Now, 80 percent of that is covered," Simpson said.

Because of the HIPAA Law (Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act) passed by Congress, the time required to wait before treating pre-existing injuries — any medical condition that existed before enrolling in a health care plan — will decrease, he said.

"The way the plan is right now, you have to wait for three years for health insurance to pay for pre-existing treatment, Simpson said. "This is if you have to go off campus for treatment. That time is being reduced to one year."

"The greatest positive consequence to the students on the plan is the dramatic reduction of the pre-existing time period and the inclusion of the Spring and Summer Terms into the mandatory requirement program," he said.

The new plan will cost single students $118 per semester and married students $182 per spouse, per semester, according to the health care plan brochure.

Modern technology to serve campus at health center

By GRANT R. MADSEN
Universe Staff Writer

The administrative director of the McDonald Health Center said the construction of the BYU Health Center will be completed May 1, 1998.

"The new building will allow the staff of the health center to serve the student population in a beautiful and non-threatening environment," Val Christensen said.

The center, at 1750 N. Wymount Terrace Drive — just east of the campus laundry facilities — is being built to better serve students and their families and will feature the latest technology for ambulatory care centers in a comfortable and hospitable atmosphere, according to a BYU news release.

The McDonald Health Center will no longer be used as the health center. "The building here will be used for some other purpose," Christensen said.

The BYU Health Center will not only be larger in space than the McDonald Health Center, it will make better use of the space.

"It's probably about 10,000 square feet more," Christensen said, "but the thing that is so much better is that it's more efficient (in its layout)."

"The efficiency of the clinical staff will be greatly improved. Students will benefit with shorter waiting times, comfortable waiting areas, completely discrete and roomy examination areas, and the best of modern technology," Christensen said.

The building will be two stories with a partial basement. Both main entries and the rear service entrance will have canopies with a slightly vaulted configuration, metal roofs and exposed structure to identify the entries clearly, according to the news release.

The building will have a two-tone brick exterior with green-tinted windows and aluminum frames.

The center will be fenced to keep children away from the building for safety reasons, stated the release.

Students and colleagues sing praises of Wilberg's work

CAMERON FULLER
Special to the Universe

Life is typical of the cubicles found in the Harris Fine Center, but his desk certainly is a photo of loved ones has been placed on a shelf; volumes relevant to his field of study line the bookcases lining the walls; a piano sits by the window.

That's his job. The piano is his life. Wilberg directs the BYU Men's Chorus and Concert Choir and is the head of the Department of Music at BYU. His efforts have elevated the program to one of the best in the country.

Wilberg started to play the piano by himself when he was four. "I played the piano really well at one time, and I was a little bit too. That's all I guess," he said, as if starting to play the piano by himself was a distant memory.

Wilberg grew up in Castledale, Idaho, attended BYU, and earned a master's degree in piano and composition. He went to the University of California and added a master's degree in choral conducting to his resume.

After many years of study, Wilberg put his services on the open market and started teaching once he was out of school.

"Well, I was lucky. My first full-time teaching position was here at BYU. I was very lucky," he said.

Wilberg's return to BYU proved to be beneficial to his personal life as well as his professional career.

Upon his return as a teacher to BYU, Wilberg proposed to his future wife, Rebecca. At the time, Mack was a new professor at BYU, and Rebecca was a BYU alumna with a doctorate in musicology. Since their marriage, Rebecca Wilberg has begun teaching at BYU and is now a part-time faculty member.

Thirteen years after getting hired, Wilberg is still at BYU and still at work in the classroom.

His classroom, however, is not like most teacher's classrooms. The classroom is more spacious. A complete set of organ pipes are found at the front, two to three pianos are on the floor in front of the stage, and several hundred soft-covered seats are always in perfect order.

When directing the Concert Choir and Men's Chorus in his classroom, Wilberg bounces up and down with bursts of energy. His arms climb, dive, glide and climb again, always trying to gather and then release every last potential sound of music. During a performance, beads of sweat cover his face.

He expects this same kind of intensity from his singers.

While preparing the Men's Chorus for a concert at Abravanel Hall in Salt Lake City, Wilberg chastised choir members for their apparent lack of focus the day before the performance.

"I look right in your face and in your eyes and can tell you're somewhere else," he warned them. "We need to focus."

There is nothing in the tone of his reproofs, however, that is mean-spirited.

Candid and straightforward every time — but never mean-spirited.

In fact, he teaches more like a personal coach who offers valuable insight along with light-hearted, constructive criticism rather than a director.

"The vowels sound murderously unpleasant," he chides.

"Even your Grandma, who loves everything you do, will know that's sloppy," he jokes.

Jerold Ottley, director of the Mormon Tabernacle Choir, once told Brigham Young Magazine, "Mack is one of the brightest young musicians I know of anywhere. His musicianship is overpowering to anyone who has anything to do with him. He has the style and charisma to challenge (students) so they feel like choir is a worthwhile activity. That's not easy when you look at the competition from other campus activities. And he is a genuine human being. He doesn't put on any airs."

Back in his office, Wilberg has a hard time singling out one experience from his career at BYU as the highlight.

"I think probably the highlight for me has been the three conventions we have sung at the American Choral Directors Association Convention where we are singing in front of our peers. We've always just received really terrific response," he said.

Wilberg believes BYU's choral program is one of the best in the country and attributes much of its success to the students.

"We're very lucky here because we have such a wealth of talent from which to draw," he said.

Elder Richard G. Scott

Member of the Council of the Twelve Apostles

Elder Richard G. Scott was sustained as an Apostle in October 1988. He was called as a member of the Quorum of the Seventy in 1977 and served in the Quorum presidency from October 1983 until his present calling.

An Idaho native, Elder Scott graduated from George Washington University as a mechanical engineer; served a full-time mission to Uruguay, and pursued postgraduate work in nuclear engineering at Oak Ridge, Tennessee.

From 1953 to 1965 he served on the immediate staff of Admiral Hyman Rickover, directing the development of nuclear fuel for a wide variety of naval and land-based power plants.

Elder Scott presided over the Argentina North Mission from 1965 to 1969 and upon his return worked as a private consultant for nuclear power companies.

He served as a Regional Representative in Uruguay, Paraguay, North and South Carolina, Virginia, and the Washington, D.C., areas until his call as a Seventy.

Among the many interests enjoyed by Elder Scott is a deep love for the natural beauty of the world.

He married Jeanene Watkins in 1953; she passed away in 1995. They are the parents of seven children.

Students present museum exhibits

By C. C. FISHER
Universe Staff Writer

Artifacts spanning the history of time are presented at the Museum of Peoples and Cultures due to the help of student curators.

The BYU Anthropology Department offers a two-year class that culminates with a showcase of the student's work, said Shane Baker, curator of the Museum of Peoples and Cultures.

The class is Anthropology 299R, and enrollment is limited to two to three students. The class is taught by Marti Allen, professor and associate director of the museum, and is reserved for junior and senior students.

Students spend the first two semesters learning about museum designs and displays. For their final project and semester, they gather information and artifacts to create a museum exhibit.

"Students play a very active role from start to finish on all our exhibits," Baker said.

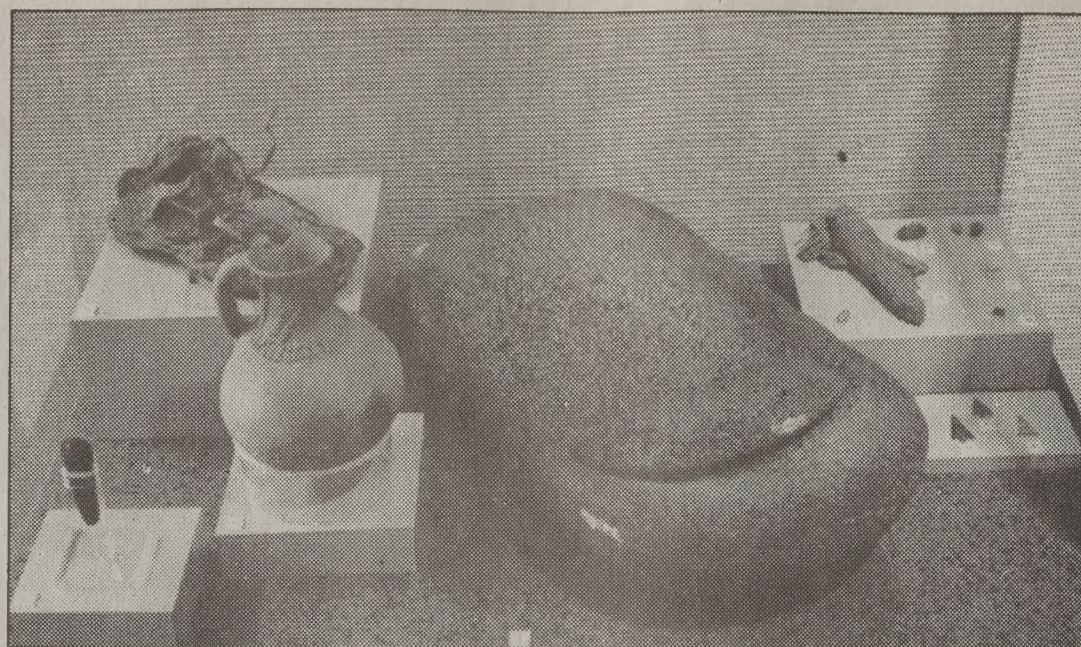

For the Follow the Sun exhibit on display at the museum, students worked for months gathering artifacts and information pertaining to the Northern Ute culture, Baker said.

Inside the exhibit is a sound booth with traditional and contemporary Ute music. A loud, steady drum beat, accompanied by human voices fill the spacious room. The music was produced by Dan Frewin of Springville, Utah, and was performed by Windstar.

"The kids love the music station," said Heather Seferovich, coordinator of public programs for the museum.

To gather information on traditional Ute music, dances and other cultural identifiers, students consulted Clifford Duncan, a traditional religious Ute leader, and the Cultural Rights and Protection Office.

"Many of the Ute leaders were afraid that the Ute culture was not being preserved, so their has been a resurgence of traditional teaching," Baker said. In fact, Baker said that many Ute leaders still speak the Ute language.

Many of the artifacts in the exhibit have been preserved in the Mildred Miles Dillman Collection. "Mildred was an LDS lady who lived on the Ute reservation near White Rocks and Roosevelt during the early 1900s. She had a love and interest in the Ute culture," Baker said. "She would ask the Ute ladies, 'Make me one of those sagebrush bark skirts,' and they would. Many of the things Mildred collected are no longer made by the Ute."

Dillman has passed away, but her family has retained her collected artifacts.

The Follow the Sun exhibit will run through July 1998.

Ombudsman: Legal problem solver

By BERT MILLS
Universe Staff Writer

Students that find themselves without any options to their various problems, ranging from tenant problems to traffic tickets, have a free resource in the Ombudsman Office.

The Ombudsman Office is where students, faculty and members of the community find options to different problems, said Brian Zayas director of the Ombudsman Office.

"The biggest advantage for the student is to find out what their options are or to be directed to someone who knows exactly what they should do," Zayas said.

Because the volunteers at the office are students, they cannot give out legal advice. The students can only show what options are available for the person to use.

According to the ombudsman handbook, "We will explore the available options with the student — what decisions he or she can make."

The office is part of BYUSA and is free to anyone who needs the service. There are 10 caseworkers who help the students find available options.

The students are volunteers.

"I think most are prelaw students, but we have a variety of other majors," Zayas said.

The Ombudsman Office is designed to help people find options to problems.

"They range from a lot of different things," Zayas said. Academic issues, landlord vs. tenant, towing problems and traffic issues all go to the office.

"We get mostly housing issues, especially between semesters," Zayas said.

Zayas gave a sample case and the procedure that the office would follow.

A common issue is not getting the refund expected from the landlord when a tenant moves out and the landlord gives no explanation.

The caseworker would first find out the history and background of the situation. Then he or she would clarify the main problem. In this case, the amount wasn't paid back in full after the tenant had properly cleaned the apartment, Zayas said.

The caseworker then takes 20 to 30 minutes to find possible solutions. The first resource is usually the Utah Legal Code. "We make a copy of it for the person," Zayas said.

The Utah Legal Code tells what is the law on the issue, Zayas said.

The caseworker also refers to directories to find legal consultation for the tenant.

"We like to give several sources," Zayas said. The caseworker would then give the photocopy and numbers to the tenant.

The Utah Bar Association and Tuesday Night Bar are also excellent resources to speak with lawyers, Zayas said.

The Tuesday Night Bar offers free consultations by attorneys at the law school. This service will begin again in September, Zayas said.

The caseworker gives the information to the tenant. They will discuss the different options and the caseworker will explain the possibilities of each option.

A week later the caseworker will contact the person and find out how things went.

This will give feedback to the office to know how things are going with the service.

The ombudsman on campus is a resource for students that could help them out of a jam.

"I think we could save a lot of headaches if people knew we were here," Zayas said.

At the start of Spring Term 1997, the ombudsman office had two caseworkers. Now it has 10 and the future goal is to have 30 volunteers.

The service provided by the ombudsman office helps out people and gives valuable experience to the volunteers.

at the last American Choral Directors Association Convention is Ray Hammond.

Hammond recalls the American Choral Directors Convention as a spiritual experience and remembers how much Wilberg prepared the choir for that performance.

"I remember at the beginning of that year, the first semester, he had us circle the date on our calendar and he said, 'This is what we're working for,'" Hammond said.

According to Hammond, when the chorus was finally at the convention and only minutes away from performing, Wilberg offered a prayer that the choir would be given an extra spiritual boost. The choir then performed better than they ever had before.

They received a standing ovation that didn't end until five minutes after every last member of the chorus was off the stage.

Another member of Men's Chorus, Jarom Ballantyne, has sung in the chorus for two years and has grown to appreciate Wilberg's approach to teaching.

"He's a motivator," Ballantyne said. "He treats you as a person. He doesn't put on a high-and-mighty act. He's very personable," Ballantyne said.

Ballantyne said he also respects

Wilberg as an individual being around him and that him one-on-one has given him an impression that Wilberg is a kind man.

Aside from his talents and abilities as a director, Wilberg composes and arranges music. He recently wrote a piece composed by the Mormon Tabernacle Choir is singing the new piece their statewide sesquicentennial tour. He says he taken the time to count the pieces he has arranged, but says that he has arranged "a lot" is. Barrus estimated Wilberg has composed or arranged hundreds of pieces. Barrus believes hundreds of their way.

"His works are performed the world," Barrus said. "Among the top living composers in the world." And as is typical of many who know Wilberg, Barrus is quick in his praise of "He fills the role of a conductor beautifully as anyone I know said."

Tradition revived new technology

Universe Services

Tradition is being reborn interpreted. The 1996-1997 edition of the BYU yearbook, coming this fall, is the first to be published in a format that has been dormant since 1985. According to Student Services, the yearbook is being reborn in a new format, using new technology, the Banyan.

complete text versions of some of the student publications on campus like the Journal of International and Area Studies, faculty and student achievements, and video highlights of various sports, performing arts, graduation and student activities," Reynolds said.

"We will even have a 'Daily Universe news highlights' section and a time line of all the local, national and international news reported in The Universe and on Newsline," she said.

The yearbook will have a link to Newsline, the consolidated newsroom's web publication and a journal entry feature so people can "sign" the yearbooks if they want, Reynolds said.

The technology has also made a yearbook affordable again. BYU had to abort printing of the yearbook over a decade ago because of the expense involved, Gholdston said.

"The yearbook was first published by the junior class in 1911, and was published every year until 1985, but it just became too costly to print," Reynolds said.

"The technology now offers much more, for appreciably less money, in a format easier to store," Gholdston said.

"I mourned the passing of the yearbook," said Bill Porter, journalism emphasis leader in the Department of Communications. "I'm excited to see technology allows us to bring a year in review back to students and alumni, yet at an affordable cost."

Having CD-ROM readers in so many computers is another reason that this project has become feasible.

The consolidated newsroom also deserves some of the credit for the ability to assemble the content of the yearbook.

The CD-ROM will run on both IBM PC compatible and Macintosh DOS-based computers that have standard multimedia components, Stubbs said.

The Virtual Banyan can be ordered through the Newsline web page at <http://newsline.byu.edu>, or by phoning (801) 378-9097. It will cost $19.97 plus tax and postage, Reynolds said. It will be available in October.

Volunteers, directors needed for campus events in fall

Universe Staff Writer

The Leadership Involvement Committee is looking for volunteers to organize Welcome Week and Homecoming parade.

The SLIC directors help the program directors put the activities together and help them use the resources at BYU.

The SLIC directors also train the program directors in leadership skills, organizing the volunteers and finding resources on campus, Gale said.

In addition to being part of the activity, students can learn a lot from participating in service and being a leader.

"It is a really neat opportunity for the students. It gives them a chance to gain organization skills and to get to know the faculty," VanTassel said.

"It's a fantastic opportunity to learn leadership skills and to have fun. It is also a challenge," Gale said.

Other activities sponsored by SLIC are Honor Week, the Devotional during Homecoming Week and Friday Night Activities.

The program director is put in charge of the parade and will decide on the plans for it. The parade usually has dancers, floats and dignitaries.

"The program director could be in the parade if he wanted to," Gale said.

The program director would also help host the VIPs of the parade.

BYU seeking waste bid: Cleanest company wins

By TRENT WELLS

Universe Staff Writer

The Chemicals Management Department at BYU is keeping campus clear, and safe.

Gerald Mason, supervisor over hazardous waste, says BYU works hard to recycle and dispose of chemicals properly.

"Hazardous waste is any thing that burns easily, is highly reactive, corrosive or toxic. BYU is like a mini city and produces lots of different things that are hazardous," Mason said.

The university takes precaution in order to use the waste the best possible way.

"Some things you can use as a waste solvent that blend into fuels for cement companies," Mason said.

"We also do a lot of recycling and reusing instead of wasting. For example, mercury can be recycled and reused, and lead-acid batteries get sent to the recycler," he said.

For now, the hazardous waste that BYU disposes of is sent to a chemicals treatment facility in Texas.

There the waste is treated chemically, used in fuels or burned.

"There are currently several waste management companies who are in the process of bidding for the business of disposing of our waste," Mason said.

BYU produces around 70,000 lbs. of waste every year, costing anywhere from $1.75 to $40 a pound to treat that waste.

"That is a lot of money that other companies would love to have," Mason said.

BYU is very careful in choosing a waste treatment company.

There are many factors that go in to choosing a company to take care of the waste, Mason said.

"We need a good firm that will treat the waste right. We need to know how that company will treat the waste before we allow them to work for us," Mason said.

"We send most of our waste to Treatment 1 in Texas," said Chad Tennant, a senior from Ohio, majoring in biochemistry.

Tennant works at the waste management office where he prepares the waste to be shipped out.

"There are two types of waste that we send out — bulk and solvent. Bulk is just materials that can be stored all together. We have five gallon plastic containers that we use in the labs, and when they get full, we put them into 55 gallon containers to be shipped out," Tennant said.

"The solvents are just material that can be dissolved or can dissolve other materials," Tennant said.

The material is shipped to the treatment facility where it is used as a fuel additive, he said.

The best way to reduce waste is not to create it, Mason said.

"We encourage the labs here that if they need a material, to use it all up; that way there is no waste," he said.

There are many things that can be done to try and lessen hazardous waste produced at BYU, Mason said.

"We can try and replace those hazardous materials with less hazardous materials," Mason said. "You can also use some products from one experiment as starting materials for another experiment. Also as a part of experiment, they can eliminate one hazardous material by treating it themselves."

Assistant university librarian: named for public services

By MELISSA ROBERTSON
Universe Staff Writer

A new assistant university librarian for public services was appointed at the Harold B. Lee Library.

Larry Ostler, assistant university librarian for administrative services, said the library's screening committee was unanimous in recommending H. Julene Butler for the position.

"She understands the public services section of the library well, and she shares a philosophy of service," Ostler said.

Susan Fales, assistant university librarian for collection development and public services, said Butler will have several responsibilities in her new position.

She will be responsible for the library use instruction program. This program includes the classes students are required to take for freshman English and General Education writing classes as well as classes related to other specific university courses. In these classes, library employees work with teachers to give students instruction on how to do research in their fields of study.

Fales estimated that 28,000 students took library instruction courses last year.

This number includes students who took library instruction classes more than once, so that number is inflated, but it is still a lot of teaching, Fales said.

Butler will also be responsible for the library reference desks as well as interlibrary loan, document delivery, course reserve and the circulation desk.

Butler has worked for the Lee Library since 1971 as a cataloger, general reference librarian, department chair, teacher and most recently as a library-use instruction coordinator.

Butler earned a bachelor's degree in English and a master's degree in library science from BYU. In 1996, she earned a doctoral degree from Rutgers University's School of Communication, Information and Library Studies.

"Her Ph.D. training helped her look at electronic resources, where the library is going generally," Ostler said.

Butler will begin working this position in September. She is replacing Paul Jordan, who was the assistant university librarian from 1980 to April 1997.

Ostler said that during Jordan's tenure, he "really made the division of technical services into a cohesive group. There were a lot of separate departments doing their own thing, and he gave them a sense that we're in a group — of belonging in a group."

The assistant university librarian position is equivalent to the assistant dean of a college, Ostler said. There are four assistant university librarians at the Lee Library.

BYU students political opinions changing between now and then

By HEATHER HANSEN
Universe Staff Writer

BYU then and now.

Unlike today's politically indifferent Generation X students, the Baby Boomer students of the '60s belonged to an era of political unity and intensity in their political purposes.

The Baby Boomer generation experienced constant political turmoil — everything from a presidential assassination to anti-war demonstrations.

November 22, 1963, was a sad day for people across the nation and at BYU.

English professor Richard Cracroft said that BYU students were very shocked and deeply grieved upon hearing of Pres. John F. Kennedy's death.

Professor emeritus of elementary education Ruel Allred, the then-principal of BYU's laboratory elementary school, said it was a shock to everyone.

"Everybody was kind of numb," Allred said. "At first it was only reported that (Kennedy) was shot. We didn't know that he was killed until later on that evening."

Although Pres. Wilkinson opposed Kennedy, he handled the situation very graciously by canceling classes for the funeral, Cracroft said. The administration permitted students every opportunity to express their grief through providing access to media coverage and through a devotional memorial service commemorating the nation's slain president.

Cracroft remembers going to the Wilkinson Center where 500 students were watching media coverage on Kennedy's death.

Even though classes were officially canceled for one day, many professors chose to cancel classes during the week. If some professors held class, they usually had very few students in attendance, Cracroft said.

"(It was) a very memorable experience," Cracroft said. "The whole nation pulled together. It was very heartening — there was the thrill of unity."

Political Science professor Lee Farnsworth said it was only five years following John Kennedy's death that his brother, Bobby, came to visit BYU in the Spring of 1968, just prior to the Democratic primary election.

At the time, the BYU community didn't realize how timely Bobby Kennedy's appearance was because he was assassinated just a few months later, Farnsworth said.

"He was such a charismatic person that he attracted people who didn't agree with him — the Smith Fieldhouse was full," Farnsworth said.

In his speech, many BYU alumni remember him asking how many young men supported the war.

When the majority of male students raised their hands Kennedy pressed the question: "Then why aren't you there?"

"Many kids supported the war, but didn't know why," Farnsworth said. "There was considerable opposition among people who were draft age. Many (men) went to Canada to escape the draft."

According to a Daily Universe editorial in 1966, the draft question was raised whether Vietnam was only for non-college students.

The editorial continued, "The Vietnam War is still fairly limited and doesn't yet need every young man in the country. Because of this, the draft is still selective and college students still have a right to be deferred if they earn it. Still, each student must make up his own mind."

According to Daily Universe archives, in November 1965, 80 BYU

students peacefully paraded through Provo to mail President Johnson a letter supporting U.S. policy in Vietnam, holding placards such as "I'm a War-Monger — I support the Troops, Remember the Dead," and "Go to College — learn to riot."

Col. David Lyon, who was the then-first professor of military science at BYU, said there was much antagonism concerning the Vietnam War among college students.

"At a California university, men in uniforms were beaten by anti-Vietnam students," Lyon said.

Although most BYU students supported the war, there was some opposition to those who didn't vocally advocate it — kind of a counter-reaction, Farnsworth said.

In retrospect, some wonder why BYU students are less politically involved than our predecessors.

"In my opinion, college students in general are less politically minded and more apathetic because of a loss of confidence in political leaders," said BYUSA president Dallin Anderson.

Alumna Laurie Snider said that the country in general was more politically involved then because of the Vietnam War.

Prior to 1988, the emphasis of BYUSA was more on governing rather than serving, Anderson said. The university's political system was modified because it didn't fit the vision of what BYU was to become.

"BYUSA was reconstructed into a service-based model with the idea to become a campus gift office and focus more on individual people," Anderson said. "BYU has to be different than other universities. It didn't contribute as much to our becoming Zion-like under the old political system."

BYU professor elected chair for physical science society

Universe Services

Bill Evenson, a professor in the Department of Physics and Astronomy, has been elected interim chair for the new FourCorners section of the American Physical Science Society.

This new geographical section will include some 1,000 APS members in the states of Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico and Utah.

The FourCorners section will host two scientific meetings each year in the region, Evenson said.

He hopes to encourage attendance and participation by students and industry professionals who might not easily participate in the APS national meetings.

Evenson has also been appointed editor of the newsletter for the Forum on History and Physics, a 2,400-member American Physical Science Society subgroup.

The forum provides programs to increase awareness of the history of physics and to promote a better understanding of the process of scientific discovery and validation.

Evenson also organized and chaired a recent symposium in Kansas City, that was attended by more than 500 physicists, which celebrated the centennial of the discovery of the electron.

Teachers look back at

By ASHLEY A. HIBDON
Universe Staff Writer

An increase in resource accessibility, competitiveness among students, degree of preparedness, and other variables have changed BYU academics over time.

Alton Thygerson, professor of health science, graduated from BYU with a bachelor's degree in 1962, a master's in 1965 and a doctorate in 1969. He feels that it is harder to get into BYU now than when he attended.

"I think it's more difficult to get in and there is a more stringent curriculum to graduate," Thygerson said. "It's more competitive and once you're in, BYU does everything it can to get you out in four years."

Lynn Garner, professor of mathematics, also graduated with his bachelor's from BYU in 1962. He believes the students who attend BYU now are better prepared than students were 30 years ago.

"There's a big change in their ability because of enrollment pressure," Garner said. "Many more students are applying to BYU now and we have better-qualified students."

When Garner attended BYU, it was rare for a student to earn a 30 on the ACT. Those who did achieve a high score usually went on to an Ivy League school. Now there are more than 1,000 students who have high ACT scores and decided to attend BYU, Garner said.

Richard Draper, associate professor of ancient scripture, received his bachelor's from BYU in 1968 and his doctorate in 1988. He believes BYU has improved in what it expects from its students.

"BYU has really come up a notch in what it expects of its students from when I was here," Draper said.

"Now it's more rigorous, and that's because of the caliber of the students."

Brandie Siegfried, assistant professor of English, received her bachelor's degree from BYU in 1988 and her master's in 1990. She feels that students deserve challenge as well as encouragement.

"While the competence and preparation of our undergraduates seems to improve each year, it worries me that our expectations of their abilities often do not match that rise," Siegfried said. "Our students deserve large doses of healthy challenge as well as continual encouragement."

"It seems to me that when I was a student here, there was a stronger sense that the truth will always bear scrutiny, and that thoughtful questions produce thoughtful new perspectives that enrich our lives and the lives of others," Siegfried said.

"I don't like to see the students treated as if their testimonies were made of glass, or as if they're bumbling children who haven't the resources of the spirit and their own God-given intellects to guide them in addressing some of life's tough problems," Siegfried said.

Steve Thomsen, assistant professor of communications, attended BYU for part of his undergraduate work and graduated with a bachelor's degree in 1982. He feels that BYU has strong academics.

"BYU's always been academically strong," Thomsen said. "We have students with such a high caliber now and they should be complimented for it."

Draper attended graduate school at Arizona State University. He feels that his experience as an undergraduate at BYU prepared him well.

He said he was actually ahead of many of his peers and that he didn't have to work as hard for his master's thanks to his hard work at BYU.

Some professors believe there has been grade inflation since they attended BYU.

Others feel that although grade inflation has occurred, it has been necessary.

"There has to be some grade inflation with so many good students now that do well," Thomsen said.

"It's hard not to have it."

University courses have been upgraded so they are harder now than they were in the 1960s, especially since the complexion of the student body has changed and they expect more, Garner said.

Siegfried is particularly pleased to see the increased support and encouragement of women in their academic studies.

"When I was a student here, there was much more ambivalence about women pursuing their interests and developing their particular intellectual gifts," Siegfried said.

"It really lifts my head above the many young women flooding the environment expressive in the present and future to a variety of disciplines."

Thygerson believes this is tougher now because he is considered an informant.

"There's so much to learn there's also so many," Thygerson said. "I used to find information in a book to find information we can find it much quicker."

"There's increased access to resources available for research," Siegfried said. "We've a good computer availability of staff to help students with research needs."

In addition to technological advances and the improvement of students who attend BYU, discussed in class are also level than in the 1960s, Draper said.

"My feeling is that education has a higher access now than what it was in the 1960s," Draper said.

The present caliber of education is higher because students have more access to resources, and in turn the professors get more from their students.

"Students demand (more) from the faculty," Draper said. "I work hard to do my part for my students."

"One of the positive changes since coming back is the willingness of faculty to spend time with students," Siegfried said.

"I am glad to see the programs aimed at helping incoming first year students who are particularly vulnerable — I think there has been such progress as a new student here."

Thygerson also feels that better quality students now attend the university.

"I think we have better students now because we have better students and let them in," Thygerson said.

"I'm not only talking about academics, I'm also talking about good people. It's a joy to

Caffeine may not be hazard to womb

Experts and doctors agree caffeine has many effects on the body, but not completely known, for expecting mothers.

Effects on the fetus have suggested at this time — not been scientifically

"The rats and humans metabolize caffeine differently and great amounts were given to the rats," Buchanan said.

Lifestyle and smoking can also contribute to the findings in the study. Two drugs taken together make for a greater outcome than one drug alone, Buchanan said.

Jeannie Galvin, a BYU graduate in Health Promotion has decided that she personally will not consume caffeine when she is pregnant, but acknowledges that caffeine has not been proven to be dangerous to the fetus.

"They don't know for sure that caffeine is harmful. You could probably have a cup of coffee a day and you'd be okay," Galvin said. "They (doctors) don't say, 'Don't drink coffee, don't eat chocolate or other things with caffeine' because they don't know the effects. But, for whoever wants to play it safe, they should probably avoid caffeine."

The book Microscale Laboratory Techniques by Barbara Hinshaw and Devin Shelley, used for the organic chemistry lab at BYU, contains more information about caffeine for nursing mothers.

"A nursing mother should be aware that caffeine passes into her milk and that this could have a stimulating effect on her infant. The baby will receive 50 percent of the concentration in the mother's blood in the milk," according to the book.

"In addition, because of the small size of a baby, the dose of caffeine received may be equal to or greater than that of an adult drinking three or four cups of coffee," Shelley and Hinshaw write.

One of the main effects caffeine has on the body, Judd said, was that it inhibits an enzyme that breaks down cyclic AMP, an important regulator in the control of cellular function.

When caffeine is consumed, "virtually every cell can have their levels of AMP altered and therefore can have their activity affected. Every cell will be affected," Judd said.

Caffeine has many strong effects on adults, but for children, these effects are much stronger because of their smaller body mass.

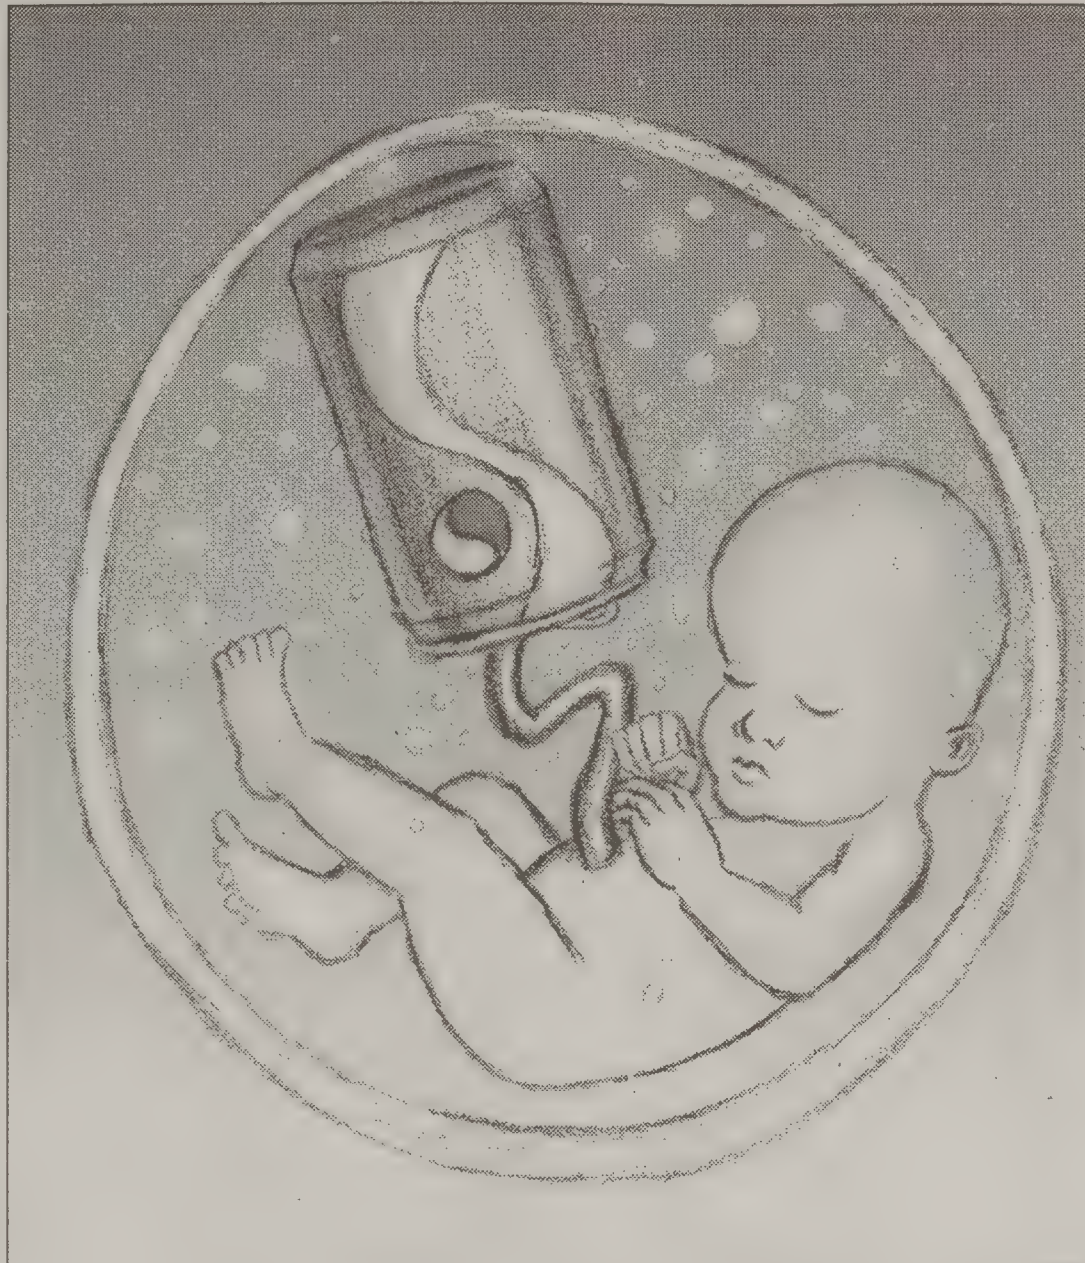

Illustration by John Lepinski

"Caffeine is metabolized in the body ... is converted ... and excreted in the urine. This process may take from two and a half to 10 hours with the average being four hours for a healthy adult," according to Microscale Laboratory Techniques. "Newborn infants ... require up to 85 hours to excrete caffeine that they may have absorbed (from the milk) from their mothers. They lack the enzyme that does the conversion in the liver."

Apart from caffeine, there are a few other commonly used substances that cause birth defects that people are not aware of.

All of the anti-epileptic drugs — those drugs the mother is taking to help her with seizures are causing birth defects to her baby, Seegmiller said.

Acutane is another common drug used by BYU students that is usually not used along with birth control measures, but should be, Seegmiller said.

"Acutane (which) is taken for acne ... causes very severe birth defects. That has been a big problem lately," Seegmiller said.

Tobacco, alcohol and cocaine, along with other drugs are the cause of many complications for the baby.

"Tobacco smoke can contribute to SIDS or damage that leads to it. It is believed (that the studies) include second-hand smoke. Pregnant women should avoid smoke-filled rooms," Seegmiller said.

"Alcohol is a big culprit in causing mental retardation. Carcinogens do a lot of things to the fetus, including post-birth cancer. The baby gets cancer, later in life because the mother smokes during pregnancy."

Articles of Faith presented visually

By DENISE PALMER
Universe Staff Writer

Some of the first visual images representing the Articles of Faith have been created.

Tim Hackleman, a recent graduate of Savannah College of Art and Design and a member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, used his graphic design talent to create an image for each of the 13 Articles of Faith.

Hackleman planned the designs for more than two years for his master's thesis exhibit. He said he wanted his exhibit to be something about the LDS Church.

"I knew I wanted to do something related to the church, and I wanted it to be challenging. The Articles of Faith just popped into my mind. They were the first and only thing that came to mind. I haven't really seen anything with the Articles of Faith in that way," he said.

Hackleman said he knew making designs for the Articles of Faith would be a challenge.

"There were enough of the Articles that would be fairly easy to solve and would make me want to do it, and there were enough that would be challenging to solve and difficult for me to attempt," he said. "Some of them I had an idea of what I wanted to do right away. (For) most of them, it literally took about two and one-half years to plan."

Hackleman's designs were on exhibit at the Rapid Transit Gallery in Savannah, Ga., June 17-29. At the beginning of the exhibit, he gave his artist's statement, telling viewers why he chose a religious theme for his thesis exhibit.

"Religion plays such a significant role in the fabric of human life," he said. "However, somehow along the way, religious art is no longer for uplifting the Spirit. Religious art was once for education, but now — in many ways — art is used for deconstructing religion and its moral value system."

Hackleman used this exhibit opportunity to expose many to the LDS Church.

"God has blessed me with a creative nature," he said. "With this talent I have chosen to return to a basic, but somehow forgotten, principle of art — to educate. Moreover, to educate the viewer about my religion, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, also known as the Mormons. So, it is my hope that when you leave, you will do so with a new awareness of at least one religion in the world."

Hackleman said everyone he talked to was impressed by the designs. Since more than one-third of those viewing the exhibit were non-members, he hopes they will want to learn more about the LDS Church.

"I hope you enjoy these posters, and most importantly, I hope you learn from them," he said in his statement.

Hackleman said he received tremendous response to the designs from not only non-members, but also from local LDS Church members. A member of a local branch presidency asked him to give a fireside about the designs, and the designs were on exhibit at the local stake center during the Pioneer Day celebration.

However, local members are not the only ones interested in the designs. Hackleman's wife, Amy, flew to Utah in June to present the images to Allan Loyburg, director of the graphics division for the LDS Church. Loyburg said the designs are interesting.

"I think it's interesting what he's done. I haven't seen anything done like this (for the Articles of Faith) before," he said.

Loyburg said the LDS Church is considering using the images.

"We're still exploring the possibility of using them. I thought perhaps the missionary department or public affairs could look at them and see if they would be interested," he said. "There is a possibility of taking one or two images and using them in some magazine for a visual. There's a lot of different approaches we could take."

My Man Friday has tried a different approach at entering the scene with some flavor. They have mixed ska with swing and a bit of cantina music.

"It's kind of by accident that we ended up playing swing-ska," said Jimmy Thompson, lead singer and guitarist for My Man Friday. "I grew up on reggae and Jamaican ska, while the rest of the band all have strong jazz and big band backgrounds. When we came together the sound just evolved naturally."

My Man Friday has come a long way since their formation a little less than a year ago. Their playing is impeccable, especially the horn section lead by alto saxophonist Caleb Chapman. The My Man Friday horn section creates intricately woven horn arrangements that come off atypical in comparison to other ska bands.

"That was one of the main goals I had while writing the horn parts," Chapman said. "I wanted to stick to a traditional ska horn sound, but I wanted the playing to have musical credibility as well."

Utah ska CDs, including My Man Friday's new debut album, can be found at most local music stores.

Banquets, buffets variety for a price in Salt Lake's JSMB

The Roof Restaurant in the Joseph Smith Memorial Building in Salt Lake City provides excellent food with an elegant atmosphere for big prices.

The Roof Restaurant opened four years ago when the Joseph Smith Memorial Building was re-designed. The restaurant has gained popularity, but has had slow times because of the construction, said Diane Mallder, employee at The Roof.

Mallder said during her two years with the company she has seen a significant increase in numbers.

"There was definitely a change. Definitely an increase in numbers. We exceeded our goals this past Christmas. With the construction, it has hurt this time of year, but Christmas is always busy."

Betty Joe Riser, a hostess at the Joseph Smith Memorial Building said the restaurants are very popular.

"I think the restaurants are a main attraction. A lot of people have been there before and they want to go back. I've only heard one complaint in the whole time that it has been open."

The Roof is an all-you-can eat buffet. Price for adults is $24.95 and $14.95 for children under 12. A Monday night family price is available on children's prices. There are six seating times beginning at 5 p.m.

"In one seating it (the restaurant) will hold about 212 people," Mallder said. "Because it is a buffet, we have different seating times. The people are given one and a half hours to eat. Seating times are 5 p.m., 5:30 p.m., 7 p.m., 7:30 p.m., 9 p.m. and 9:30 p.m."

Quilting, embroidery replaces sewing in '90s

By SARAH DAVIS
Universe Staff Writer

Many of the talents and skills known to the women of the '50s and '60s have become quite foreign to this generation.

Quilting, canning, cooking from scratch, cleaning without cleansers, sewing ... the list of skills and talents that the "ideal" mother and wife should have back then is endless.

Many of these skills are still popular, but many of them are things that women just don't know how to do in this age of mixes, microwaves, dry cleaners and canned goods.

Emily Tassainer, a BYU graduate in elementary education, has her own opinion.

"I don't know how to do any of them (canning, sewing, quilting, etc.). I think that now it is just as easy to buy it, whereas it wasn't that easy back then. If I was to sew something now, it would take me forever. I could just buy it and not waste the time. I don't even want to learn."

One of the skills known by many women who grew up in the '50s and '60s, but is quite foreign to this generation, is sewing.

What has happened to this generation ... the children of these expert sewing mothers?

For some, sewing has become a hobby rather than an economic necessity like it often was for other generations.

"I love to sew, but not every day — I have to be in the mood. If I'm not in the sewing mood, I make lots of mistakes and I cuss." The "sewing mood" for Hamilton comes from thinking of new ideas for clothes.

Carrie Osguthorpe, 22, a junior from Houston, Texas, majoring in interior design, is enrolled in a sewing class this term at BYU.

"A lot of married women are in the class so they can make clothes for their children," Osguthorpe said. She enjoys it because she can be creative and make modest, yet stylish fashions.

Sewing for ourselves or children is not as popular now, but more specialized sewing is gaining popularity, said Karen Bell, a designer for Better Homes and Gardens, creator of Ding Dong Designs Patterns and employee at The Stitching Corner at 480 N., 200 West in Provo.

Quilting, heir looms, embroidery and dolls are some of the sewing specialties gaining popularity in the classes at The Stitching Corner.

When asked why people are doing more specialty sewing rather than traditional "clothes sewing," Bell said that specialty sewing is an art people are excited to learn.

"They are willing to spend a lot of time to learn an art. If it is going to be an heirloom ... or quilt, they will spend the time. People do this a lot more for enjoyment and to learn."

Computer enhancing debated

Associated Press

NEW YORK — Want slimmer thighs, instantly? Or that ugly mole removed?

Forget plastic surgery. With digital photo retouching all the rage at glossy magazines, celebrity-style makeovers are only a click of the mouse away.

"There's a lot more retouching now than there used to be," says Robert Newman, design director for Details magazine. "You even have the situation now where people's heads are grafted onto different bodies. That happens all the time."

The creation of such computer-assisted Frankensteins — lovely though they may be — has launched a furious debate over the ethics of digital photographic makeovers, pitting artistic freedom of the photographer against a celebrity's critical control of his or her image.

"People are so used to seeing images manipulated that the lines of what's acceptable have really blurred," Newman says, citing Time magazine's infamous darkening of O.J. Simpson's mug shot as an example of crossing the line.

Now, it's possible for anyone with a few hours on a mid-priced desktop computer — equipped with software like PhotoShop — to alter the content of photos. What once took hours to airbrush or consolidate can be done in a matter of seconds by a well-equipped and savvy art department.

This summer, actress Mira Sorvino cried foul when famed photographer David LaChapelle digitally altered her eyebrows, added a scowl and superimposed another figure for a photo-spread in Allure magazine.

Sorvino assumed she would be portrayed as screen siren Marlene Dietrich. In the end, she looked like a malevolent Joan Crawford.

"I wouldn't defend that," says Randall Lane, editor of P.O.V., a men's magazine. "We might take out a stray hair, or lighten red eyes, or even change the background color. But any magazine with a core reputation at stake can't go beyond the simple touch-ups."

"It's an artist's vision," counters Allure's editor-in-chief Linda Wells. "We commissioned LaChapelle as an artist. The layout is his interpretation."

Few celebrities complain, she adds, when blemishes are removed, legs are lengthened or more flattering pictures are selected from a batch. "It's all a question of degrees."

Celebrity publicist Susan Patricola, who represents such stars as Jim Belushi, Dan Aykroyd and Rob Schneider, disagrees.

"All you have to sell is your image," she says. "For many of these stars, they are their only franchise. When you chip away at their franchise, it's like raping them."

In one notorious case, Oprah Winfrey's up-and-down weight struggle took a bizarre twist when the talk-show queen's face was superimposed on actress Ann-Margret's hourglass figure for a TV Guide cover in 1989.

"I don't think you'll find too many people in more legitimate work taking the head of somebody and putting it on somebody else," says Caren Clarke of Art and Commerce, a New York-based arts agency that represents many top photographers, including LaChapelle. "Most people will limit themselves to more minor changes, more cosmetic changes."

Industry veterans can recount numerous image altering, such as the time Madonna was given an orthodontic overhaul in Entertainment Weekly to the instant "slimming" of pudgy celebs.

Readers, however, might not catch these subtle tricks.

Did anyone detect Harrison Ford's facial scar disappearing from a recent Premiere magazine cover? Who caught McCall's giving Kathie Lee Gifford an electronic manicure? Or when Premiere realigned Jodie Foster's bellybutton, digitally moving it a full 3 inches?

Clarke recalls seeing a recent portrait of Sting in a bathtub that was returned to the US magazine art department with careful instructions. "They had circled all his toes," she says. "And there was a note: 'Clean up his cuticles.' I mean, who's ever even going look at those? But that's the extent to which people are plucking hairs and nipping and tucking."

Utah Opera Co. presents Puccini Night of love, lies

By LISA MARIE MEYER
Universe Staff Writer

The Utah Festival Opera Company audiences with its production of "Tosca," Puccini's story of love and murder.

Tosca appeared at the Eccles Theatre and created the perfect storm for a cultural event. The designs of the concert hall hall the elegance.

The sets were with an entrance by an escaped prisoner who is the protagonist, painter Mario Cavaradossi, to help him hide. Cavaradossi agrees to aid the fugitive.

The beautiful singer, Floria Tosca, Cavaradossi and gets involved with the villain Baron Scarpia, the evil police chief who pursues Angelotti. Cavaradossi, yearns for Tosca's love. Lies prevail as the tragedy unfolds.

The singers were incredible. The soprano Luna sang the part of Tosca with feeling and technical perfection. The tenor maintained great vocal range in the extreme ranges of the voice.

Baron Scarpia, a junior from Provo, is a family science, loved by his family. "Vissi d'arte, vissi d'amore," he sang.

Baron Scarpia mastered the rich, dark tones of his character. Scarpia, played by Brian Montgomery, sang with authoritative power which reflected his wicked dominion of law enforcement.

Montgomery, sang with authoritative power which reflected his wicked dominion of law enforcement.

"He had a powerful, energetic voice that carried well," Kramer said. "His acting was also excellent."

Christopher Holmes, an opera student at Oberlin College, felt that Scarpia was more consistent in his vocal performance.

The dramatic plot called for over-the-top dramatic acting.

"However, I did find myself wondering if the acting challenge could have been met better," Holmes said.

The sets were professionally done and the scenery was authentic. The final set was a favorite of mine because the sky revealed a passage of time from night to morning with impressive lighting effects.

The costumes reflected the time period of the year 1800 with elegance. I noticed the clothes were archetypal in nature. The villain Scarpia wore dark clothes, while the heroine Tosca wore pale blues and yellows.

The chorus blended well and provided powerful, moving sound. The orchestra's music was beautifully flawless and greatly enhanced the production.

Although the drive is long, especially with I-15 construction, I feel seeing an opera is a valuable use of time.

Holmes also feels it's definitely worth the drive.

S composer Kurt Bestor produces 'Sketches'

By SARAH DAVIS
Universe Staff Writer

The instrumental and folk songwriter Kurt Bestor have produced a new soundtrack titled "Sketches."

The first non-holiday album produced in more than 10 years is a mix of light and upbeat songs. It gives a breath of fresh air to traditional classical music and the rhythmic sounds of bluegrass jazz.

Sketches is a unique combination of musical numbers. The songs had great beats and Bestor has the amazing ability to create in his songs sensations that lead the mind to peaceful, calming thoughts. It was a perfect combination to listen to after a busy day.

In his biography, Bestor said that his music gives images to dreams and brings us to life as unknown heroes, as new ideas and inventions emerge in our minds.

"Bestor falls under this category of 'unknown hero' himself, with the fact that millions have heard his music — they just don't know who he is," according to his biography.

Bestor might best be remembered by BYU students for the release of his soundtrack with the

Bestor's Christmas soundtracks are probably the best known of his works in this area. Formerly known as "Airs Christmas I and II." They have recently been given the new titles of Kurt Bestor Christmas I and II, according to a news release.

Bestor's accomplishments include an Emmy, more than eight albums, numerous national television music themes and 30 film scores.

James not ready to quit after 32 years

By JOEL WHITE
Universe Sports Writer

For many Cougar sports fans, the name Paul James is synonymous with BYU athletics.

As KSL TV and Radio's voice of Cougar sports for over thirty years, James has been witness to some of the greatest moments in Cougar sports history. But due to declining health and the increased stresses put on sports broadcasters, James retired from calling BYU basketball games for KSL radio following the Cougar's basketball season. James will continue to do football broadcasts.

James was honored by BYU Athletic Director Rondo Fehlberg at the men's basketball team's final home game of the season for his contributions to Cougar athletics. He was presented with a basketball with the signatures of each player on the team. "Paul James is an icon at BYU," Fehlberg said. "He is identified with the entire modern era of BYU athletics. There are not many fans of BYU athletics who can remember anyone else calling BYU games. It's the end of an era."

James has been KSL's voice of the Cougars for thirty-two years. Starting with broadcasts of both football and basketball for both KSL TV and radio, James moved to radio only in 1987. During the Cougar hoopster's year, James decided to cut back and only do football.

"I can't keep doing it forever," James said. "I've reached a point where I decided that I have to quit sometime, and it might as well be now, considering what I've been through. I was looking to slow down a little."

James suffered a heart attack in November of last year, leader to six bypass surgeries. He was back behind the microphone for the football team's stunning Cotton Bowl victory. He had his doctor on hand in case of any emergencies.

"I was really excited to do that game," James said. "I had never done a New Year's Day Bowl Game before."

After my surgery, I asked the doctor what the recovery time was, and he said there was no chance that I would be doing anything until next year. I said, 'What about the first of January of next year?' He said, 'OK, as long as you don't carry any of your luggage and take your surgeon with you.' He was the surgeon. He sat behind me in the box. I guess he thought he could call 911 better than I could."

James didn't let a heart attack stop him from finishing the Cougar football season, but this year's basketball schedule proved too much for the longtime broadcaster.

"It's a very rigorous schedule," James said. "During the basketball season, you're out of town from Wednesday until Sunday every other week. I was going to stop doing it (basketball) before the new year, but I really didn't want anybody to think I was leaving the team because they were losing, so I stayed on through the end of the season to lend support. That basketball team was such a special group of guys. I wanted to finish the season with them."

As a sideline color commentator for KSL sports, Doug Miller, now Director of Broadcast production and Development at KSL News, worked with James, then the Sports Director for KSL TV, on BYU football games for about 12 years.

"We traveled together to all the road games over the years," Miller said. "We were together during the eras of (Marc) Wilson, (Jim) McMahon) and (Ty) Detmer. Those were great years. Paul had such a great relationship with all those kids. They showed him a lot of respect. All those kids loved to joke around with him, they liked him a lot."

James is notorious for his intense preparation for the games he calls.

"I remember times," Miller recalls, "when we would get to a city to do a game, and PJ would lock himself in his hotel room with a bag of chips and a bottle of pop from the time we got there to the time we went to the stadium. He would live like a hermit for a day and just sit there with hundreds of facts, figures and trivia written on little pieces of paper taped to the walls to get ready for the game. He would study the teams BYU was playing exhaustively."

PAUL JAMES

James has been on hand for some of the most memorable moments in BYU sports, but two stick out in his mind.

"I've been there for all the great quarterbacks, all the great coaches," James recalls, "but when we won the championship (in 1984) by beating Michigan was one of the greatest moments I can remember. In basketball, I'd have to say the most memorable game was the game against up in Fort Collins in 1970 with all those protesters."

James recalls that a group of African-Americans, who were part of an organization called the Black Student Alliance on the Colorado State campus, protested the game between the Cougars and the Rams Feb. 5, 1970, because at the time, blacks could not hold the priesthood in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

"Everything was fine until half-time," James said, "and it was all a mess."

Members of that alliance stormed the floor while the Cougarettes were performing, and a near-riot ensued. A molotov cocktail sailed by my head as I sat there at the scorers table, and hit the ground right in front of where I was sitting. The bottle didn't break, but if it had, I would have been in bad shape."

Despite the hard times, James is grateful for the career he had.

"BYU sports has been my life for 32 years," he said. "I just knew when it's time to step down (from doing basketball). You know you should when it ceases to be enjoyable, but in my case, my health was the reason. Some people don't know when to quit, as they say."

NBA all-stars to thrill Japan's Tokyo Dome

Associated Press

TOKYO — Japanese fans of U.S. basketball paid as much as $350 a seat to watch two exhibition games and National Basketball Association stars such as Shaquille O'Neal and Charles Barkley.

In all, 14 NBA players will participate in the games on Wednesday and Thursday night, including 10 all-stars.

NBA games have long been very popular in Japan, with some televised live. This is being billed as the first off-season, all-star exhibition game ever played outside the United States.

By the evening, 70 percent of the 38,000 seats in Tokyo Dome had been sold, including all 500 of the $350 courtside seats.

During a news conference today, the Houston Rockets' Charles Barkley said he came up with an idea to play the games in Japan and invited some players to join in.

Besides O'Neal of the Los Angeles Lakers, participants include Houston's Clyde Drexler, Miami's Alonzo Mourning, Charlotte's Glen Rice, and Atlanta's Dikembe Mutombo.

"I wouldn't invite anybody I don't like," a relaxed Barkley said.

The players will be split into two teams.

Seattle's three players — Shawn Kemp, Gary Payton and Detlef Schrempf — will be on Team Shaquille and seek revenge against Team Barkley, which includes him and Houston teammate Clyde Drexler. Seattle lost to Houston in the second round of the NBA playoffs in May.

During the news conference, some players were asked about the dispute that Kemp, Seattle's power forward, is having with his team.

Kemp, who did not attend the press conference, demanded a trade after the Sonics were eliminated in the second round of the playoffs, saying he was unhappy with the way he was being treated by the team. Under his contract, which runs through 2003 and cannot be altered before Oct. 8, he is scheduled to make $3.6 million in the 1997-98 season.

Payton said he and Schrempf are doing their best to talk Kemp out of leaving the team.

"Hopefully he will be with us, and I think he will," Payton said. "It's just a little tension going on between him and the Sonics right now."

Buzz lit up by streaking Firebirds, but regroup against Sox

Buzz burned Phoenix's power hitting

The Buzz got burned at their own Quest Field Thursday night, but they didn't have enough arms to stop the fire.

The damage was done the night the Phoenix Firebirds 10, 8th game, home series against the San Francisco Giants farm team. The Buzz can be blamed on the pitching staff, a shortage of pitching," said manager Phil Roof who watched the team lead turn into a 10-4 deficit in the eighth. "We had a pretty good game for seven innings, but we didn't have the same kind of effort against them they had against us."

It is one thing, but no matter how hard the infield plays, they are going to catch a ball hit ten feet over their heads.

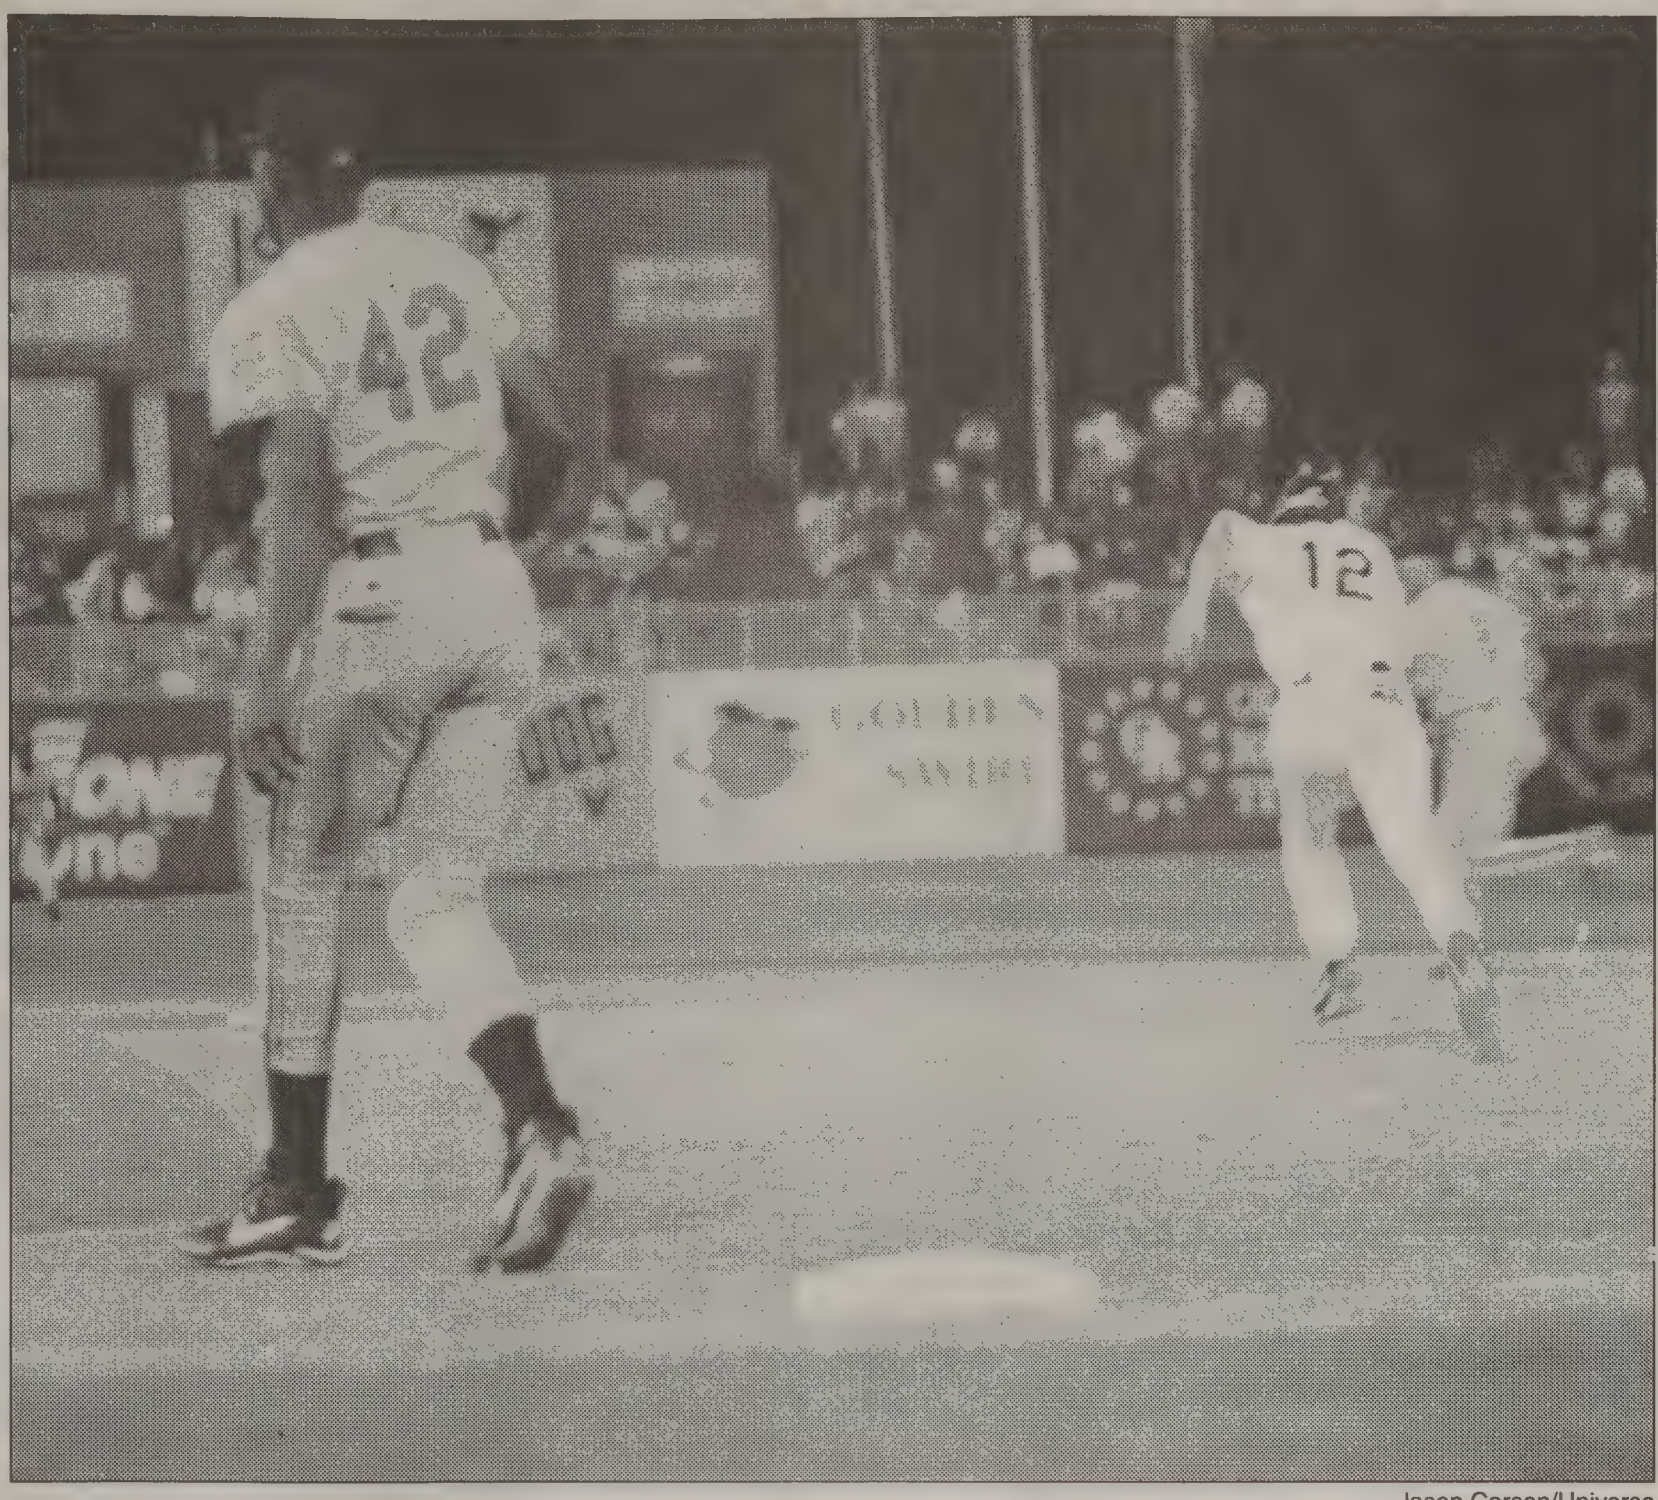

Buzz pitchers are injured, and help comes in the way of rehabilitating, calling players up, or signing new meat, the Buzz hopes of a title do not look good.

The game started innocently enough, but when Mark Redman recorded the first out in seven-and-one-third innings while only giving up three runs and two walks. Meanwhile, the Buzz offense bloomed late, scoring runs in both the sixth and the seventh to bring a one run lead into the eighth.

When they hit the wall.

Kind of stretched Mark out, he's got 125 pitches that's bad," Roof said. "We told him after the game that he could be out as soon as he was getting out."

He courageously went into the field and got Doug Mirabelli to line out to center. But then his arm gave out, and he left the field to the depleted Buzz bullpen, and the field to well deserved cheers.

Kevin Legault came in and the Firebird bats came alive.

"That has happened one other time in my career," Roof said in the locker room later, still appearing to be in shock from the shelling his pitcher received. "Seven hits to right field. I hope it's the last time."

Legault let in six runs, though the first was charged to Redman, and got no outs. It got so bad that Kevin Baez, an infielder, had to come in to pitch the Buzz out of the inning.

"They played tough, they also have a horseshoe hanging over their head," Roof said of the Firebirds win. "It's the little things, when done right and executed, that wins ball games. They're a little bit more mature than we are."

The game was not without bright spots, Jon Shave hit like it was batting practice all night, going 4-for-4 with a double and a walk. "I've been out for a while so it feels good to have a good game, to get my confidence back," Shave said. "I believe in this team, we've had some good stretches this year, there's no reason we can't win some of these close games. I think we have a chance."

Roof concurred with his hard hitting third baseman, "if we can get some healthy pitching and rest some guys we'll be alright. We still have a chance to do something, we're not out 'til it's over."

Or 'til the pitching dries up.

Now's the time for Buzz playoff run

By ERIK R. RASMUSSEN
Universe Sports Writer

Just under a month to go in the season, it's time for the Salt Lake Buzz to decide if they are serious about playing postseason baseball.

The Buzz lost three of four in the series with the Firebirds, failing to obtain a series split Thursday. But the Buzz postseason hopes hinge mostly on if they are able to beat sub-.500 teams down the stretch.

The last regular season game is September 1. Before then (not counting Thursday's Firebirds game) the Buzz play 24 games, 20 of which are against teams who have lost more than they have won this season. The four games facing an above .500 team are against the Tacoma Rainiers (of the Seattle Mariners organization), who are only two games above even on the year. And those games are in the last home series of the regular season, which the Buzz should be pumped for anyway.

The Edmonton Trappers' schedule is not too much more difficult than that of the Buzz, so there is little room for error on Salt Lake's part. Edmonton plays 24 games as well, but eight are against above .500 teams: Tacoma, and the red-hot Firebirds in Phoenix.

But first things first, Friday started off a four-game series against the Colorado Springs Sky Sox at Franklin Quest Field. The Sky Sox are tied for last in the Pacific Coast League, 18-28, going into Thursday's action.

But Buzz pitching is the big question mark going into the stretch run. Dan Serafini gets the starting nod Friday. He has as good a chance as any Buzz pitcher to get a win, and he did just that against the Sky Sox, winning 8-2. Saturday also brought a victory for the Buzz, when the crushed the Sky Sox 7-2. Keith Linebarger starts Sunday, and Jose Parra will go Monday. Parra has been a fixture in the bullpen until recently, his new role as a starter says as much

Up a four-game home series against the Phoenix Firebirds (of the San Francisco Giants organization), they now find themselves three games behind division leading Edmonton.

Weary arms not a problem as Buzz give up just one run

As if they didn't have enough problems with pitching injuries as it is, the Buzz got themselves into a pitching duel Monday night.

But they won, 3-1.

With this win, the Buzz take the four game series from the Colorado Springs Sky Sox (of the Colorado Rockies organization) three-games-to-one, and are in good shape going into an eight-game road trip.

Playing like a National League ballclub, the Buzz pieced their victory together, never striking more than once an inning. But you can't argue with results.

With Jones out of the game in the bottom of the eighth, the Buzz added an insurance run as left fielder Ryan Radmanovich knocked in Bret Brede.

Manager Phil Roof, who under healthy bullpen conditions habitually yanks his starters after six or seven innings, left Baptist in for the top of the ninth. Roof has seen too many leads blown late by his injury-depleted pen.

Center fielder Chris Latham ripped a double to lead off the game. Designated hitter Todd Walker drove him in a few minutes later, and it seemed like a typical high scoring game. Then the pitching took over.

Travis Baptist put on a slick pitching display for the Buzz, stopping the Sky Sox flat. After giving up a pair of hits in the first inning, Baptist did not allow a hit again until the sixth. The only run he allowed came with two outs in the sixth, when Sky Sox first baseman John Vanderwal doubled in Colorado's only run. Baptist struck out the next batter to get out of the inning.

Baptist ended with one earned run, five hits, and seven strikeouts in eight-and-one-third innings.

As Baptist wowed the Colorado hitters, the Sky Sox had an ace of their own. Bobby Jones started for Colorado, and was nearly as dominating as Baptist. Jones struck out nine Buzz batters (the ninth tying a Buzz hitters franchise record for strikeouts in a single season) in Baptist performed admirably. He got back at Vanderwal for driving in the only run charged to Baptist by making him fly out to right. That left the last two outs for Buzz newcomer Fred Rapp. Rapp has worked his way up from Single-A ball at the beginning of the year, and he showed why he is here.

Rapp struck out the first man he faced, gave up a single, then got the last out to fly to center to snag his first save with the Buzz.

The Buzz entered Monday just three games behind the first-place Edmonton Trappers. The Trappers are on the road playing the Phoenix Firebirds, where they have lost three straight to the home team.

The Buzz received some good news after their game, as they learned that the Firebirds beat Edmonton 6-4 in Phoenix.

The streaking Firebirds continue to be the hottest team in the Pacific Coast League. With the loss, the Trappers now hold only a two-game lead over the Buzz.

MONEY NO CAMP: Tight ends for the Jacksonville Jaguars throw plastic footballs into the air to practice catching difficult passes. Who shows up to camp depends on who has signed a contract.

Boulware not satisfied, Bills can't re-sign Smith

Associated Press

While Tarik Glenn finally agreed to his NFL career with the Baltimore Ravens on Monday, Peter Boulware, the Baltimore Ravens' No. 1 pick, headed home with no end to his holdout in sight.

Contract negotiations with the Ravens' defensive end out of Florida State University reached an impasse.

Over the last three days, the Ravens and the agents for Peter Boulware have exchanged a number of proposals and discussed a variety of contract possibilities. We have not been able to reach an agreement and, presently, there are no meetings or discussions scheduled," the Ravens said in a statement.

"It is our understanding that Peter's agent has recommended that Peter return to Florida."

Boulware had been slated to start at defensive end, a new position he is learning at two minicamps. Meanwhile, Glenn, the 19th pick out of California, agreed to a four-year contract, and is expected to practice on Tuesday.

Glenn had been projected as the Ravens' starting left tackle, but second-round draft pick Adam Meadows has moved into that spot during Glenn's holdout.

Still, the arrival of Glenn will be welcomed by an offensive line that remains one of the team's biggest weaknesses. The Colts have had their quarterbacks sacked 10 times in two exhibition games.

The Colts' fullback Roosevelt Potts also ended his holdout by agreeing to a one-year contract on Monday.

Potts had been sent a five-day letter of intent and did not report by the July deadline, a decision that means he is ineligible to play until the second game of the regular season.

The Ravens got some good news with middle linebacker Ray Lewis returning to practice for the first time since suffering a frightening neck injury on July 29.

"Sometimes when you're on the sidelines, you think the worst," he said. "But it wasn't like that. It was a pain, but it's over and I'm back. I don't even think about it anymore."

The Ravens' general manager John Butler and Bruce Smith's agent, Leigh Steinberg, met for several hours, but little progress was made, discussions were without a new deal.

The Ravens were attempting to restructure a five-year offer worth $22 million that Smith had previously rejected.

"Nothing is done," Steinberg told The Associated Press by telephone from Smith's home. "We had good discussions. We plan to continue tomorrow." Panthers Kevin Greene's holdout has prompted coach Dom Capers to move inside linebacker Micheal Barrow into Greene's old spot, left outside linebacker.

Capers said the move was an experiment and Barrow could be switched back to his old spot, right inside linebacker, in the near future.

"We need to give this thing a few days and see how it works itself out," Capers said.

Barrow joined the Panthers in February as an unrestricted free agent from Houston, he was specifically told he would play inside when he signed a five-year, $18.5 million deal.

At 6-foot-2, 236 pounds, Barrow is considered too light to play outside, but he said he's willing to give it a try.

Lorenzo Lynch, trying to win back his starting safety spot from James Trapp, missed practice with a sore back and may be sidelined for a few days.

But Lynch said he may be able to play in Saturday's exhibition game against New Orleans.

"I just tried to work through it and I got to a point where I couldn't work through it anymore," Lynch said Monday. "I'll take a couple of days off." Vikings Running back Robert Smith, linebacker Ed McDaniels and safety Orlando Thomas, who all sustained serious knee injuries last season, returned to contact drills.

All three began training camp on the physically-unable-to-perform list. All three may play Saturday at Cincinnati. Lions Newly signed rookie cornerback Bryant Westbrook will play with the first unit in practice and in the exhibition game Sunday against Pittsburgh.

"We're putting him in there to get him the work. We drafted him to be a starter but we're not certain that he is because he's missed so much time," coach Bobby Ross said. Giants Former Utah basketball star Brandon Jessie, signed as a free agent tight end by New York in the offseason, was placed on injured reserve on Monday.

Jessie, who averaged 15.2 points per game for the Utes from 1994-96, has been sidelined with a partially dislocated shoulder since July 20.

DNA tests reveal proof in Albert case

Associated Press

ARLINGTON, Va. — Sperm and saliva found on the woman who has accused sportscaster Marv Albert of assault contain genetic material consistent with his DNA, a state crime lab said yesterday.

The samples recovered from the woman's underwear and from bite marks on her back were tested against a blood sample provided by Albert.

The Virginia Division of Forensic Science report found only a 1-in-2.6 billion chance that the sperm sample taken from her underwear and saliva from her upper back could have come from someone other than Albert.

The 42-year-old woman accused Albert of attacking her in a northern Virginia hotel room Feb. 12. The woman told police Albert threw her onto a bed, bit her back repeatedly and forced her to perform oral sex.

The NBC sportscaster has not entered a plea to charges of sodomy and assault charges, but has denied the woman's claims.

Albert's trial is scheduled for Sept. 22 in Arlington County Circuit Court.

Albert's lawyer, Roy Black of Miami, said in a statement released through a public relations firm that his client "reasserts his innocence and will establish his innocence in court." Albert's Virginia lawyer, Peter Greenspun, had no comment on the lab results, filed late Friday.

Forensic scientist Karen Curtis Ambrozio found the strongest evidence in samples taken from the front and back on the woman's underwear and from one of the bites.

She said in her report that because of such evidence Albert "cannot be eliminated as a possible contributor of the genetic material isolated from these samples."

The laboratory report found a higher probability that someone other than Albert could have contributed sperm found on the woman's chest. In that case, the probability is 1-in-310 million that a white person other than Albert was responsible.

The lab report also concluded some DNA samples were consistent with a mixture of DNA from Albert and his accuser.

TROUBLED TIMES: NBC sportscaster Marv Albert, has needed support of friends Heather Faulkner and attorney Jerry Traub. Evidence that may prove Albert is guilty of forcible sodomy was filed yesterday.

Phillips is arrested for possession of cocaine

Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Just when it seemed as if the Anaheim Angels were in perfect position for a run at their first playoff spot in 11 years, leadoff hitter Tony Phillips was arrested for investigation of cocaine possession.

What happens next for Phillips and the Angels is uncertain, but it appears the fiery infielder-outfielder will be with the team Tuesday night when it opens a seven-game road trip in Chicago.

"Tony is scheduled to rejoin the team in Chicago," Angels director of communications Bill Robertson said Monday. "What we need to do is let the legal process run its course, and we will reserve judgment until all the facts are compiled and reviewed."

When asked if Phillips would play against the White Sox, Robertson said, "That's up to our baseball operations."

Manager Terry Collins had said Sunday night that Phillips would play Tuesday night.

Robertson said the Angels, who are being run by the Walt Disney Company for the first full season, wouldn't comment further Monday.

Phillips, 38, was arrested early Sunday morning by Anaheim police, who said he bought a small quantity of free base cocaine.

The Orange County District Attorney's Office will review the case and decide what charges, if any, should be filed.

That could take a while, according to an employee of the county who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

"It can take weeks, depending on how quickly the district attorney gets a complaint," the employee said. "I'm sure that they have to look it over, see how it was handled. You know darn good and well they have to find out if it was legally done, how it came down."

Major league baseball spokesman Rich Levin, speaking from his office in New York, said Phillips remains eligible to play.

"Obviously, major league baseball is aware of the Tony Phillips situation," Levin said. "At this point, we don't know very much about it. Everyone is allowed due process in this country. We will see what happens."

"If a person is arrested and convicted, due process has taken its course and baseball can move ahead with whatever action it deems appropriate."

"For a first offender, our policy is to get a person help. The doctors from the clubs and the doctors from the (players') union would meet with him and make sure he has the best possible help he can get."

Before the Angels played Baltimore at home Sunday night, they issued a statement saying, among other things, that they "intend to comply with all major league baseball rules regarding the Tony Phillips situation."

The statement also said, "While the Anaheim Angels Baseball Club and Anaheim Sports Inc. do not condone the use of illegal substances for any member of its baseball club or organization, we will reserve judgment until all the facts are compiled and reviewed."

Phillips' teammates refused to comment on the matter, but Collins said after speaking with Phillips that he is "convinced this hasn't been an ongoing problem."

"We've dealt with lots of things all year long and we'll move ahead," Collins said following the 4-3 loss to Baltimore. "I know he will be back in the lineup on Tuesday, and we need his energy."

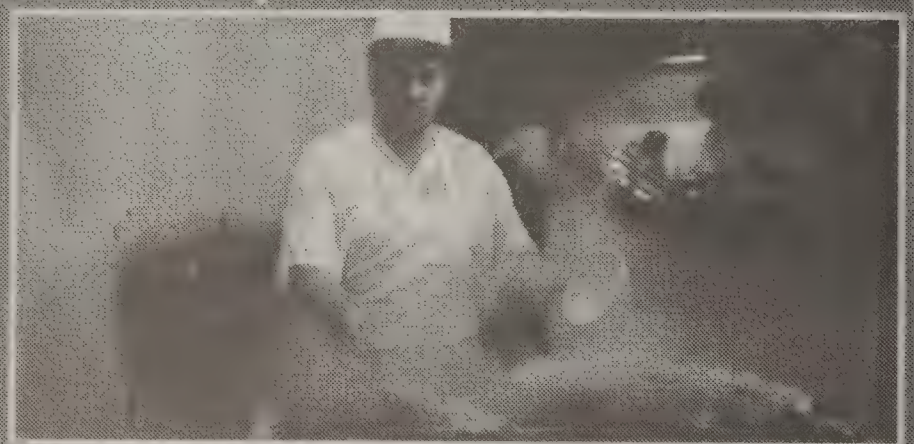

Phillips was going to play against the Orioles, but after talking with team officials, he left for Arizona to spend time with his family.

Phillips has been one of the keys in leading the Angels to the top of the AL West standings since they reacquired him from the White Sox on May 18. He is hitting .279 and Anaheim is 46-31 since his return.

Lacrosse becoming popular in the West

STEPHEN GORDON
Universe Sports Writer

The game referred to long ago by the name American Indians as "the game of the Father of War," a way to settle disputes and toughen warriors. It is now known as the "Creator's game" in which the Indians owe their Creator through a notion of speed, agility and

It's known as the game of a combination of soccer, basketball — the "fastest of the four" — as many would say, the oldest known sport in America, developed by the Indians as early as the 15th century, given its name by Jesuit missionaries from France, who saw similarities between the sticks used to play lacrosse and the bison-horn stick carried by their bish-

East Coast and Canada today, lacrosse's legacy remains intact, and is considered just as important as basketball and baseball in an American curriculum. In the West, it is overshadowed by other sports which have achieved predominance. Such is the case in Utah, but it's changing due to the efforts of a few individuals who want lacrosse to prosper.

Like a salesman with a great pitch, said Mason Goodhand, head of the Utah Lacrosse Association.

Goodhand, a Baltimore native and former college lacrosse player for the University of Maryland, moved with his family to Utah in 1993 and started the Utah Lacrosse Association a year later. At that time, lacrosse programs existed outside of Utah's extramural one: the Utah Lacrosse Association, which had an instructional manual and Judge High School in Provo, whose program was casual and for students just for the sake of playing lacrosse, Goodhand said.

In the fall of 1994, under Goodhand's leadership, signs of a lacrosse era emerged as two teams, high schools from Park

City and Utah County (a combination of Orem and Timpview) fielded players and were added to the roster of competition. Much of this growth was attributed to the efforts of volunteers who, according to Goodhand, posed flyers and spread information by word of mouth.

"Our original goal was to generate numbers. Nationwide, growth is booming," Goodhand said.

Utah has done well to keep pace with nationwide growth. By 1996, the number of high school teams grew to eight, with programs being introduced to high schools Highland, Alta and Brighton.

This year, six more teams — Skyline, Olympus, Jordan, Bingham (a Division II team), East and Murray high schools — were formed, while Orem and Timpview split in two to make way for a new Utah County Division II team, which is comprised of Mountain View and Timpanogos players.

For some people, like Utah County assistant coach Mark Stout, the opportunity just to be involved with lacrosse is a reward in itself. "It's a dream to be involved and be in a position to influence kids for good," he said. Stout, a former BYU lacrosse player, is an equipment supplier for the local high schools, and also referees in his spare time. His enthusiasm for the sport runs deep; he still plays locally for the Alta Lacrosse Club, a team of former high school and college players.

It's this kind of enthusiasm that has helped lacrosse reach its rapid growth rate in Utah. According to Goodhand, "A lot of people have a passion for it. Today it isn't quite as romantic, but people do feel a bond to it."

Much of the connection former players have with lacrosse stems from the excitement it offers. Although it varies for men's and women's teams, the sport is reminiscent of soccer and hockey. The length and width of the field are very similar to soccer, and each sport has attackers, midfielders, defenders and goalkeepers.

Just as in hockey, the players are allowed to body check and make contact to dislodge the ball. This constant body contact requires the use of protective equipment.

However, unlike soccer and hockey, the nature of lacrosse often produces high-scoring results for each team, which is uncommon in soccer and rarely seen in hockey.

For Pete Stevenson, a former Utah County player, the frequent scoring is what attracted him to lacrosse while considering other sports. "There's no comparison," he said. "It's so much more fun to play than basketball or football. It's even exciting to watch."

Lacrosse's growth is juxtaposed by the success of BYU's lacrosse team, which Goodhand feels has added to the enthusiasm of the younger players. By attending BYU home games, "They can visualize the next stage of lacrosse and it inspires them to raise their skills to the next level," Goodhand said.

BYU Head Coach Jason Lamb agreed, adding that increased support from the university benefits everybody, although the university may not recognize it yet. "The development of BYU lacrosse mirrors the high schools' development. As the support from the university has increased, so has the talent." That talent has enabled BYU to win its first league title and compete for the national lacrosse club championships in St. Louis.

Lamb, who played high school lacrosse in Long Island, N.Y., further added that by watching BYU's success, high schools set out to emulate it. "In any sport, when the home team plays a higher level of competition, it allows kids an opportunity to see the sport at a higher level," he said.

Just this year alone, BYU played host to Colorado State, the University of Colorado, Stanford and UC Davis, while visiting Colorado College, Whittier College, Chapman University and the University of Arizona.

Mason, citing that 100 lacrosse players will graduate from Utah's high schools this year, stressed the need for more lacrosse teams in Utah's colleges and universities. Along with BYU, the universities of Utah and Utah State have recently organized teams, but those programs will not be able to accommodate the ever-growing number of high school players attending those colleges.

Another problem lacrosse stems from lack of support from parents of high school players. Those involved in running the association are unpaid volunteers who devote much of their free time to coaching and organizing teams.

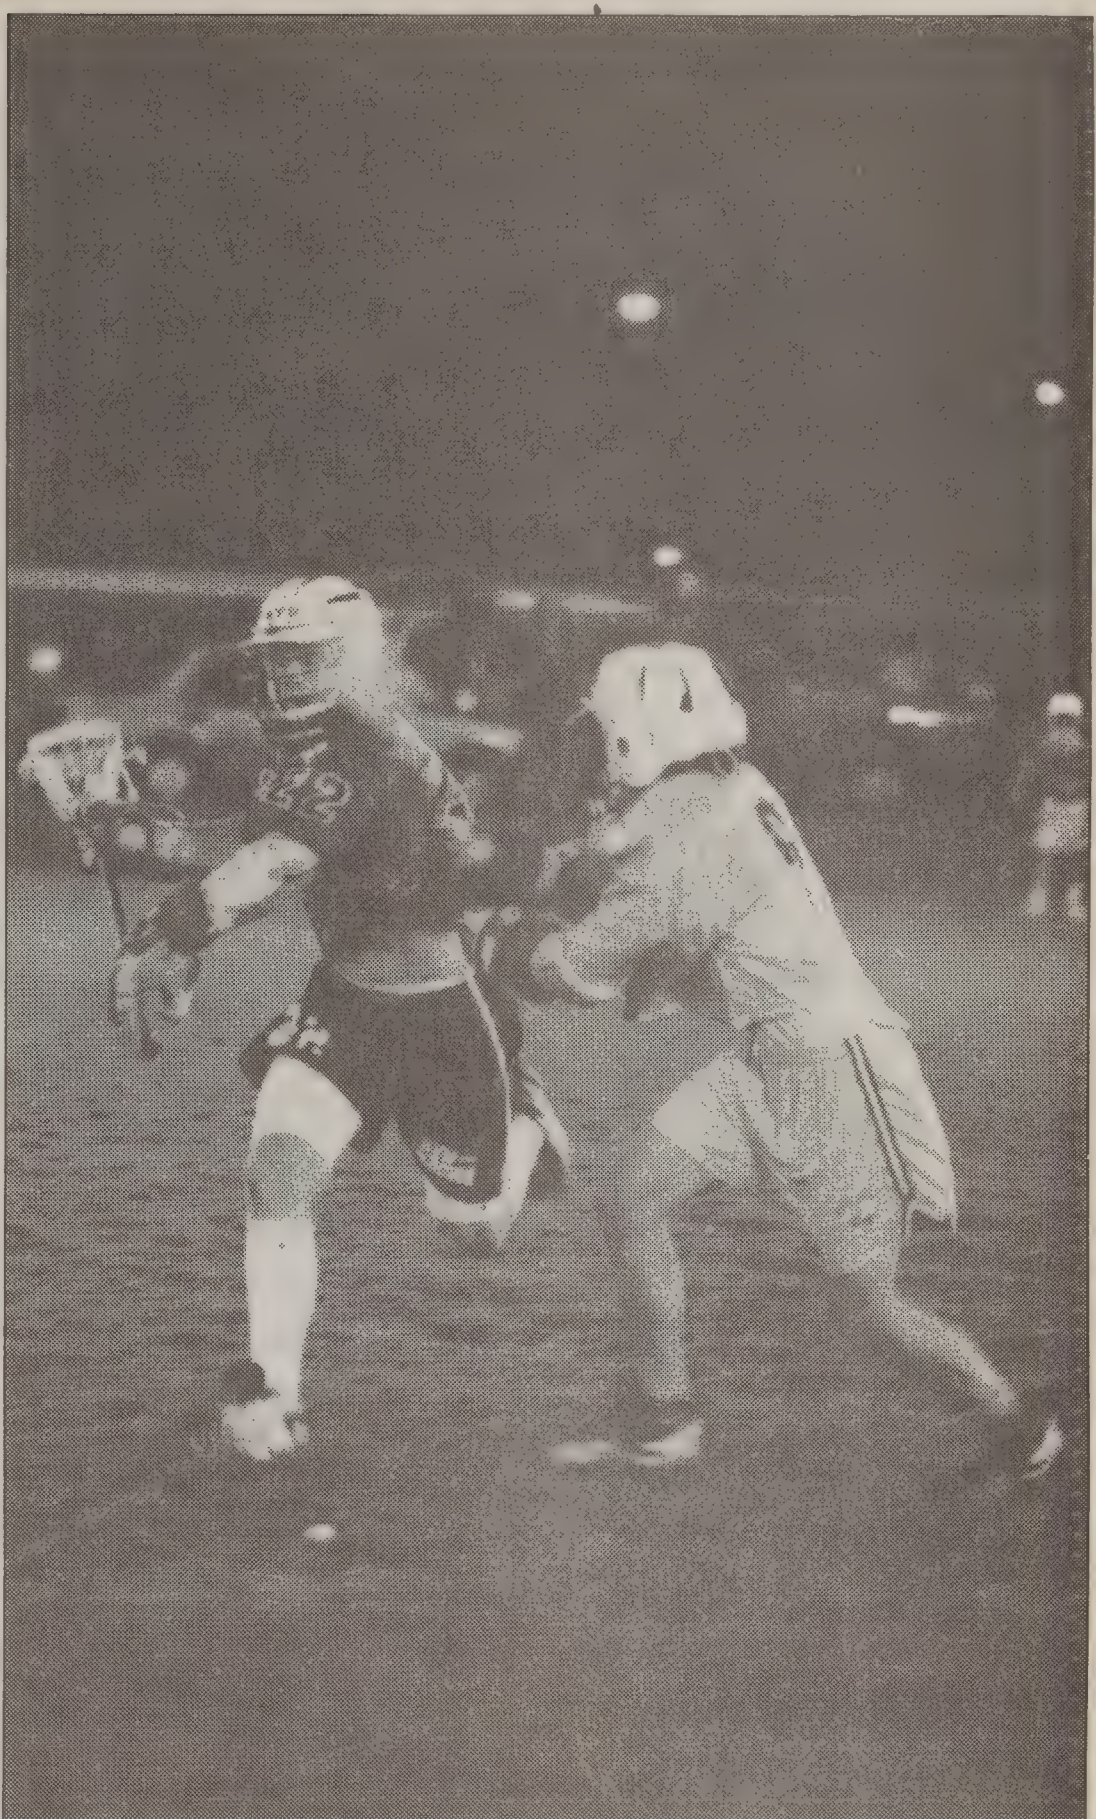

For most parents, the sport of lacrosse is relatively new, according to Goodhand. "Parents don't know about the sport. They don't know if their child will stay in it, or if it's just a fad."

The price of equipment also discourages some parents from allowing their children to play. Generally, equipment sells at $200 and can reach as high as $300. "People see it as kind of an elitist sport," Stout said. For people with four or more children, which is common in Utah, lacrosse may even seem a little too expensive.

However, despite all the obstacles, all involved in the organization feel the sport is coming along just fine. In the past three years, lacrosse has attracted over 400 players in the Salt Lake and Provo areas, and the two Pee-Wee leagues (consisting of players from grades four to nine), which attracted 25 kids last year, will have 80 kids playing this year.

With lacrosse growing at its current pace, Goodhand said its future depends in the ability to be able to control growth, and improve the overall quality of the players it produces, and of the organization:

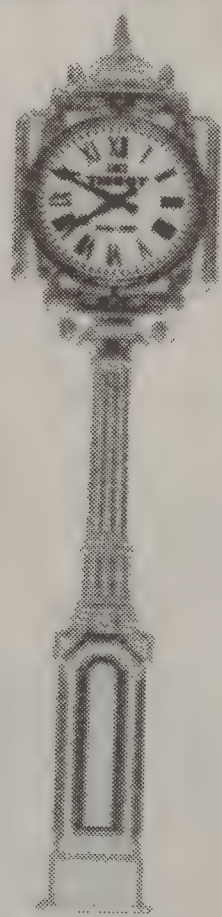

"We'll (progress) as fast as our volunteers let us. We'll get burned out if we're not in control."

Students train for flames at UVSC firefighting school

By DEREK FAY
Universe Staff Writer

Two students clad in protective firefighting gear clutched the dripping hose and waited intensely as the instructor checked his stopwatch.

Their anxious expressions melted into smiles as the verdict was shouted across the parking lot where they were training.

"One-thirty-one, good job," the instructor yelled.

The students had finished the practice drill in one minute and 31 seconds, well under the requirement time to qualify for Firefighter I certification. This is only one of several certifications offered at the Utah Fire and Rescue Academy in Provo.

The Utah Fire and Rescue Academy is one of the fastest growing programs of its kind in the state, said Alan Joos, certification coordinator for the academy.

"The reality is that the demand exceeds our ability to deliver classes right now ... our entry level classes have a full enrollment all the time. We're anticipating being able to expand that program within the next one to two years so we can accommodate more of the demand," said Terry Spoor, associate director of the academy.

The academy was created when state legislation was passed in 1993, which allowed for better funding for the training program.

It is through UVSC and classes can be taken for college credit. People can be trained in over 14 different areas.

Training is provided to aspiring firefighters as well as career firefighters trying to advance in the field. The academy also offers a two-year fire science degree.

"The (students) actually take both written and practical skills tests here, and are awarded certifications upon completion of the training," Spoor said.

To receive the Firefighter I certification, which is entry level, 72 basic hands-on firefighting skills must be adequately performed, said John Shields, an instructor at the academy.

Advanced training at the academy allows firefighters with experience to learn the skills required to manage a fire crew, Spoor said.

Competition in the firefighting profession is fierce.

In order to even apply for a position at the Provo Fire Department, an applicant must have state certifications as Firefighter I and as an emergency medical technician.

"Even for the departments that do not require a degree or training for employment ... our graduates typically fill the top slots on the lists," Spoor said.

Like any other business experience in firefighting is tant to be considered for a job.

"It tells us a lot about a person has gone to school on their own, paid their way to achieve things that we would otherwise do for them," said Dave the battalion chief in charge of the Provo Fire Department.

There are a handful of firefighters that don't require education to apply for a job, this works to some applicant when they are match academy graduates, Spoor said.

"(The academy) gives us training so we can feel confident what we do," said Matt from Valencia, Calif.

A lot of students at the academy have different agendas when it comes to career choice. The academy provides cross-training to accommodate them.

"I'm an EMT, I just want to increase my skills and my knowledge," said Jeanne Baker, Rexburg. Baker is a student academy who is already a medical technician in the Tats Ide, 21, from Tokyo, student at the academy who has always dreamed of being a firefighter.

"In my city, the houses are packed together," Ide said. "If a house it will spread quickly and the people will die."

American family settles suit with PLO

Hijacking murder finishes in court after 12 year wait

Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Palestine Liberation Organization has settled a 12-year-old case brought by the family of a wheelchair-bound American who was killed and tossed into the sea during the hijacking of the Achille Lauro cruise ship.

The PLO reached settlements a week ago with the family of Leon Klinghoffer and with a cruise travel company, but all parties agreed to keep the terms of the deals confidential, said Rodney E. Gould, lawyer for Crown Travel Service Inc.

"It was amicably settled," said Lawrence W. Schilling, a lawyer for the PLO. He declined to comment further on the settlement, in which the PLO did not admit to any wrongdoing.

The Achille Lauro was seized in October 1985 off Port Said, Egypt, by Palestinian terrorists who held 413 people aboard hostage for two days until the commandos surrendered to Egyptian authorities.

The agreements, entered into the record in U.S. District Court in Manhattan last Wednesday, ended 12 years of litigation for the Klinghoffer family and Crown Travel Service Inc.

They left everyone "on all sides happy it's concluded," Gould said from his Framingham, Mass., office.

Lisa and Ilsa Klinghoffer, the daughters of Leon Klinghoffer, however, continue to call for the extradition of Mohammed Abul Abbas, the Palestinian convicted in absentia of masterminding the hijacking. The Klinghoffers filed a lawsuit against the PLO after their 69-year-old father was shot while sitting in his wheelchair and then thrown overboard.

The hijackers were captured and turned over to Italy, which let Abbas slip out of the country before a U.S. arrest warrant could be served.

Abbas resurfaced in the Gaza Strip in April 1996 after years of living underground. He called Klinghoffer's death "a mistake."

Gould never obtained a deposition he had sought in the case from PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat despite threats by a federal judge to find the PLO liable and to conduct a hearing on damages if Arafat did not submit.

Arafat was willing to provide it earlier this year but canceled at the last minute because of a problem in the West Bank city of Hebron, Gould said, adding that he suspected the case was finally settled because it was about to go to trial.

In court papers, Crown Travel Service Inc., based in Union, N.J., had argued Arafat "was personally involved in freeing the hostages and indeed boasted about his efforts in that regard."

The travel agency sought damages for its loss of revenues when a three-year package of cruises with the ship had to be canceled after one year.

Firefighters control California blaze

Residents

Associated Press

Calif. — Residents preparing for a fire burning outside their homes as the flames moved toward them, officials said they had the fire mostly contained.

The fire has charred 23,000 acres of forested land and Los Padres National Forest property since igniting Friday. Crews had it 70 percent contained Sunday, said U.S. Forest Service spokesman Steve Kerpan.

Those who could see the flames were hoping to leave Friday. But chances of an evacuation were "next to nil," said Mary Kerpan, a Forest Service spokeswoman.

High humidity and lower temperatures helped the blaze from expanding as it did last week, she said.

Towns of Fillmore and Piru are south of the fire, which is moving east.

More than 1,900 firefighters aided by water-dropping helicopters battled the Piru blaze. Firefighters also tried to deprive the blaze of fuel. Firefighters suffered minor injuries. A fire burned Sunday in the Santa Monica National Forest, 20 miles south of Santa Maria. It burned 50,000 acres and was 90 percent contained, officials said. No structures were damaged. Fire also made progress fighting a fire in Lassen Volcanic National Forest in northeastern California. The fire burned 1,870 acres and was 50 percent contained.

A fire in the Monarch Wilderness area of the Sequoia National Forest burned roughly 2,100 acres of forest by Sunday, and was 29 percent contained. No giant sequoias were threatened in the fire, which is 200 miles north of Los President Ronald Reagan and Secretary of State George Schultz at the height of the campaign against international terrorism during the 1980s.

Netanyahu was the deputy chief of mission to the United States (1982-84) and ambassador to the United Nations (1984-1988).

In 1988, he was elected to the Knesset, the 120-seat Israeli national legislature, and later served as Israel's deputy foreign minister and as deputy minister in the prime minister's office.

He was elected to the leadership of the Likud Party, one of over 20 Israeli political parties, in 1993.

In 1996, Netanyahu won Israel's first direct popular election for prime minister. According to a 1996 CNN election overview, "For the first time in Israel's 48-year history, its prime minister was elected by direct popular vote. Formerly, the prime minister was selected by the president, who was appointed by the Knesset."

He received 50.4 percent of the vote, and his opponent, Shimon Peres, received 49.5 percent.

In his victory speech he said, "I see my first task as prime minister is to mend the rifts, to reduce the tensions and to strengthen the unity and the sense of partnership, which is the basis of our existence. And I want to tell you, the first peace is peace at home."

Recently Netanyahu has been accused by left-wing labor party leader Shimon Peres and others of being a hard-liner and causing more tension with the Palestinians. Former prime ministers Peres and Yitzhak Rabin received the Nobel Peace Prize together with Yasser Arafat for their advancements toward peace in the Middle East conflict.

YASSER ARAFAT

According to CNN Newsmaker Profiles, "The Palestinian-Arab politician, former terrorist and nationalist leader Yasser Arafat, was born Mohammed Abdel-Raouf Arafat al Qudwa al-Hussain in Cairo, Egypt, on August 24, 1929."

As a young boy, Arafat moved to Jerusalem, where he learned of the conflict between the then native Arabs and immigrant Jews.

In 1956, he earned a degree in engineering at the University of Fuad I in Cairo. While at the university, he studied the Jewish life and the works of Theodor Herzl.

"By 1946 he had become a convinced Palestinian nationalist and was already weapons in Egypt to be smuggled into Palestine in the Arab cause," according to the CNN profile.

After Israel had been created out of former Palestinian land, he helped found Fatah, a group that sought to liberate Palestine. He later led raids into Israel and was elected chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) in 1969.

In 1974, after Arafat spoke to the United Nations in New York, the PLO was given observer status at the U.N. Palestinians were also given the right to self-determination.

In 1993, Arafat and Rabin signed a peace agreement that created the Palestinian Authority. In 1996, the PA's 88-member Palestinian Council was elected, and Arafat became president by an 88 percent vote, according to Grolier Multimedia Encyclopedia.

According to Grolier, Arafat was criticized by some for his autocratic style of leadership and his failure to reverse the Palestinian standard of living.

TENSION IN THE 20TH CENTURY
Both leaders lead their constituents through violence caused by centuries of conflict. From a religious perspective, both the Jews and Muslims lay Biblical claim to Jerusalem.

According to Houghton Mifflin's "History of World Societies," some Jews existed in Jerusalem even after Rome had conquered the city.

A more recent development toward Jewish nationalism, known as "Zionism" arose from persecution of Jews in Europe. One leader of this movement, Theodore Herzl (1860-1904), a Jewish-Austrian journalist, believed Jews would never receive their rights until they united under their own state.

"By 1939 the Jewish population of Palestine had increased almost five-fold over 1914 and accounted for about 30 percent of all inhabitants," according to History of World Societies.

The same text also said most Jewish immigrants came from urban backgrounds and preferred living in cities where they competed with the Arabs, over "the land issue combined with economic and cultural friction to harden Arab protest into hatred."

In 1948, the United Nations defined the territory that presently constitutes the modern nation of Israel, not including some territories Israel has annexed through war victories over neighboring countries.

Life and death for Israelis and Palestinians are now determined in part by their leaders' ability to negotiate a peaceful settlement.

NOW HEAR THIS: Hillary Rodham Clinton speaks at a reception hosted by the Women's Leadership Forum of the Democratic National Committee in May 1997. Her public appearances on behalf of various causes are part of her second-term strategy to focus on national issues.

First lady's agenda to spotlight D.C.

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — John Word slowly unfolded himself from the conference room chair, stood before Hillary Rodham Clinton and said in a soft, hesitant voice, "Please, Mrs. Clinton, thank your husband for me."

Word, principal of Garnet-Patterson Middle School in Washington, told the first lady that President Clinton ordered federal agents to sweep the school neighborhood free of drug dealers after one of his students complained at a White House event.

Mrs. Clinton politely accepted the thank-you but said it was frustrating "that the young woman had to go to the president of the United States to stop having to go to school past open-air drug markets."

The first lady managed to turn the principal's compliment into an upbraiding of local bureaucrats and school officials who, she said, do not do enough to protect children. She urged school officials nationwide to "put safety of children first."

The July 1 exchange was part of Mrs. Clinton's second-term strategy: increase appearances in her current hometown to spotlight her national agenda.

In recent months, Mrs. Clinton has made several appearances to promote various causes. For example, she visited an elementary school to urge charitable foundations and corporations to help pay for safe-haven learning centers that keep children off the streets after class.

In another appearance, she told business leaders that despite all the negative attention, Washington "is a unique place to live, work and do business." She urged them to support programs that give small loans to fledgling entrepreneurs.

A visit to a local hospital helped promote a program that gets pediatricians to prescribe books to youngsters along with medicine.

Mrs. Clinton hopes her appearances will help improve conditions in Washington and highlight her national agenda.

McVeigh denied retrial, sentencing to begin

Associated Press

DENVER — A federal judge rejected Timothy McVeigh's bid for a new trial in the Oklahoma City bombing Monday and ordered him to appear for formal sentencing Thursday.

McVeigh's lawyers had contended jurors were unfairly swayed by pretrial publicity and devastating testimony from bombing survivors and victims' relatives. U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch rejected the arguments, ruling McVeigh received a fair trial.

In June, McVeigh was convicted of murder and conspiracy for the April 19, 1995, bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building. The blast killed 168 people and injured more than 500. Matsch will impose the jury's sentence of death by injection at Thursday's sentencing.

In seeking the new trial, McVeigh's attorneys argued Matsch had erred by refusing to allow into evidence key parts of the defense's case, including the full report into allegations of wrongdoing at the FBI lab and the theory that an international conspiracy was behind the bombing.

They also singled out one juror who reportedly told another juror during the trial, "I think we all know what the verdict should be." Matsch denied a defense request to replace the juror, saying the comment apparently was made in jest.

Matsch ruled without addressing each argument. "The court finds and concludes that all of the questions and issues raised in the defendant's motion have been considered and ruled on," he wrote.

McVeigh's attorney, Stephen Jones, said he wasn't surprised by the ruling and plans to appeal by the end of the month. "Most of these were issues that had been raised before, but we needed to raise them again," he said.

Matsch "ensured the McVeigh trial not only was fair, but indeed was close to perfect," prosecutor Sean Connelly wrote in a brief opposing McVeigh's motion for a new trial.

Clinton's reforming hypocrisy

President says to ban soft money, raises $650,000

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Do as I say, not as I do. President Clinton makes no bones about the fact that is his approach to campaign finance reform. Thus, one day he renewed his demand that Congress outlaw the kind of fund-raising events he starred at the next day.

Democratic fat cats got a good laugh with their $25,000 tenderloin and couscous dinner when Clinton told them that if the overhaul bill he has endorsed passes Congress "it will save you a lot of money."

He was right. A lot of the hard cash they shelled out was "soft money," the no-limits kind of contributions to parties the bill would outlaw.

Give all the advocates of cleaning up the system the benefit of the doubt. Call them all sincere about tightening the rules of the system that finances their political futures. But until the system is cleaned up, they will chase the money.

Clinton told a news conference last Wednesday that he has asked the Federal Election Commission to ban soft money, "but I will not, at the same time, bankrupt the Democratic Party and say that I want you to have no money."

That sentiment took him to Washington's Mayflower Hotel the next evening to help the party raise $650,000.

Clinton backs a bill filed by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Russell Feingold, D-Wis., that would ban soft money and reduce contributions by political action committees.

So far, McCain and Feingold look very lonely. Frustrated in their efforts to bring their bill to the Senate floor, they are threatening to attach it to unrelated legislation in order to force a vote on its provisions.

They are betting that once their proposal is before the Senate, the public will demand its enactment.

"Overwhelmingly, Americans think this is a problem that has to be solved and by almost equal margins they're very pessimistic that anything will happen," said former Vice President Walter F. Mondale, co-chairman of a group seeking to build public support for campaign finance reform.

"At this point you can't be too optimistic about what's going to happen," said Mondale.

As Mondale knows, time is running out. Fund raising for the 1998 elections is proceeding at a furious pace. According to FEC records, the Republican Party raised $29.2 million in the first six months of this year — $12.7 million in soft money. You can understand Clinton's concern. During the same period, the Democrats raised $16.8 million — $6.9 million in soft money. Is Congress ready to reduce that flow?

David Rehr, a former Republican congressional aide who now is a top official of the National Beer Wholesalers Association, does not expect meaningful changes to emerge.

Rehr said the McCain-Feingold bill asks members of Congress to "modify their behavior at precisely a moment when they don't want to."

The beer wholesalers have one of the largest political action committees of any industry association are not interested in seeing by reform legislation.

Rehr predicted that Senate vote to cut back on PAC contributions would get a vote the next time they were less groups looking for support. "The next time they call and say we need your help will likely say to them that thanks," he said.

Another factor that could bipartisan support for Feingold is the issue of union

Republicans, including want to include a provision unions from using dues for political purposes unless give their permission. Union by Democrats, bitterly opposed such provision.

Conservative activist Norquist said the issue money will effectively undo bipartisan backing for the bill.

"You would lose even Democrat who has endorsed Feingold. So there is no Feingold," he said.

HERE'S THE SKINNY: Sylvester Stallone and wife, model Jennifer Flavin at the premiere of "Control." Stallone's latest film, "Cop Land," features a new look for Stallone — he had to gain 40 pounds for the part.

Rocky past behind, Sly looks to his future

Associated Press

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — It wasn't the usual Sylvester Stallone interview. He seemed subdued, even somber, and more self-revealing than usual.

The apparent reason for his mood wasn't disclosed until four days later: Stallone's wife, model Jennifer Flavin, whom he married in London on May 17, had just suffered a miscarriage. The couple has a year-old daughter, Sophia Rose, who underwent successful surgery for a hole in her heart last November.

Stallone spoke in an upbeat way about his life at midcentury (he turned 51 July 6):

"I have a woman that I'm fully in love with, a daughter that I'm obsessed with; I feel healthy. I like the fact that I had the opportunity to work with world-class actors. ... I'm a very, very lucky guy."

He was referring to his new film, "Cop Land," in which he appears with Robert De Niro, Harvey Keitel and Ray Liotta.

Although Stallone has been a top star since "Rocky" in 1976, the path has been anything but smooth. His first two marriages ended in divorce, and he has often been a target of the tabloids.

"There were a lot of mistakes, a lot of abuses, a lot of vanity and egocentric behavior that somehow spoil the good times, spoil your reputation, spoil your responsibility," he said.

"Whether you like it or not, you have a responsibility, once you reach a certain level, to conduct yourself as a positive force. When you're depicted as a man who's thought of in one way, and you live a life of reckless abandon and utter excess in every area, what's the message?"

"Once you get to the top, abuse it, take advantage and have no responsibility and live for the moment and to hell with the future — that part I wouldn't enjoy."

"Anyway, it's a lesson well learned. I'm not happy to say I lived through it. But I'm happy I survived it."

Stallone attributed his adult troubles to his early life. He grew up in New York's Hell's Kitchen, spending much of the time in foster homes since his parents could barely support themselves. They divorced when he was 11.

"I came from a rather tumultuous background," he said. "I had a fantastic mother who was never given the opportunity she wanted; she had to take care of the house."

"I never really developed any foundation where I knew how to conduct myself. Now I have learned the importance of stability. That was a long lesson. A long lesson."

Stallone talked enthusiastically about "Cop Land":

"It's the most gratifying thing, regardless of how it turns out, to go back to the school of ensemble acting that I hadn't seen since 'The Lords of Flatbush' (his first important role, 1974).

Moviegoers will be seeing a different Sly in "Cop Land." As Freddy Heflin, the sheriff of a New Jersey village where New York cops live with their families and plot crooked and murderous deeds, he is paunchy, deaf in one ear and disheartened by his humdrum job.

"To give credence to this character, there's no way I could repeat any of the old habits and make it work," said the actor, who gained 40 pounds of flab for the role. "I couldn't still go to the gym and be conscious of what I looked like: Am I making a physical impression?"

Midwestern water may be endangered by pesticides

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An environmental group says the levels of weed killer found in tap water in 245 Midwestern communities are too high, even if they meet government standards.

Federal officials are considering tougher rules for pesticide levels in both food and drinking water, the Environmental Protection Agency said Monday, with some action expected by 1999.

The study by the nonprofit Environmental Working Group focused on atrazine, a chemical sprayed on corn to kill weeds, as well as several related chemicals. In high doses, atrazine has been linked to cancer.

Using a new food protection law, the environmental group developed its own, tighter standard of what it considered dangerous levels of atrazine. It then concluded that tap water in 245 Midwestern communities contained that level or more.

The pesticide levels would affect about 4.3 million people in communities in nine states, the environmental group says. Most of the towns are in the Corn Belt: 77 in Illinois, 70 in Ohio and 49 in Missouri.

The other 49 communities are scattered through Delaware, Iowa, Indiana, Kansas, Maryland and Nebraska. A list of specific communities was not available.

The atrazine tap water standard used in the study — 0.15 parts per billion on average over a year's time, compared to 3 parts per billion now — has not been adopted by any government agency.

But EPA officials said Monday it is likely that atrazine levels would be tightened by 1999 as the new Food Quality Protection Act is implemented. In addition, EPA is examining atrazine and related chemicals to determine how dangerous they are.

"We have to reassess the food standards for all the pesticides," said Dr. Lynn Goldman, the agency's assistant administrator for pesticides. "We've got to add in the drinking water risk with the dietary risk."

The environmental group contends that atrazine and other pesticides repeatedly appear in tap water with unknown long-term health effects.

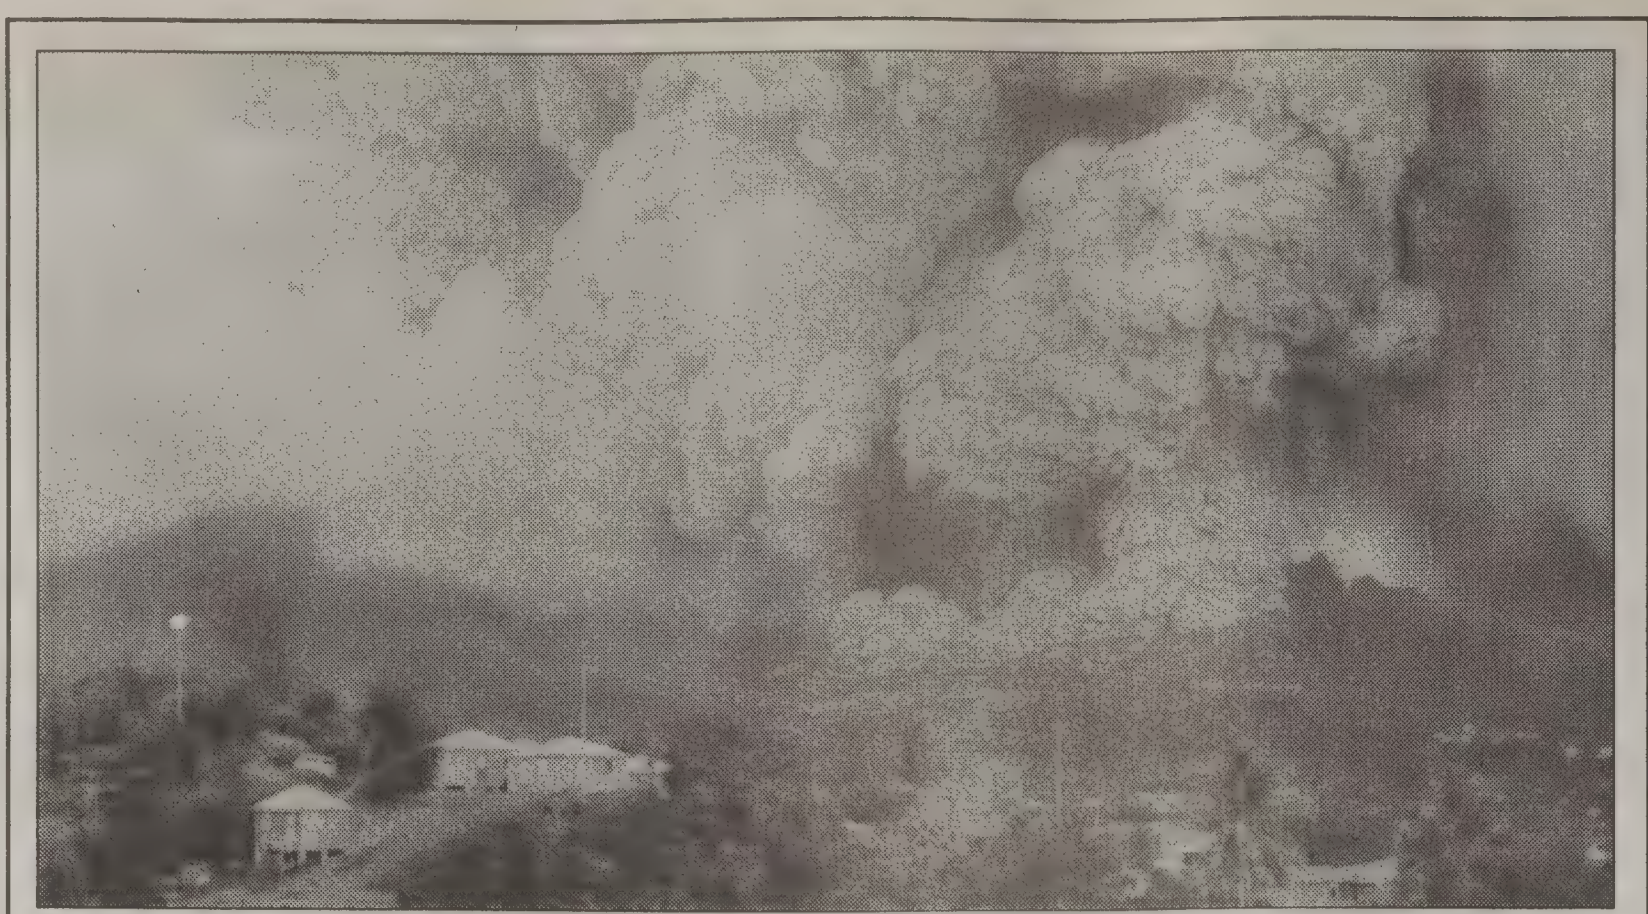

In Ohio, officials note that only one of the 70 communities cited by the group — the town of Sardinia — has failed to meet the current federal standard of 3 parts per billion. Using the food law to speculate about a new water standard doesn't make sense, they said.

"If there was something to worry about, we'd be the first ones to notify people," said John Sadzewicz, chief of the Ohio Environmental Protection Agency's water division.

City systems would have to spend up to $3 billion to upgrade treatment systems if the current atrazine standard were tightened significantly, said Diane Vandehei, executive director of the group. Chemical companies should be forced to foot part of this bill instead of consumers, she said.

But pesticide makers dismiss the study as speculative, alarmist and aimed mainly at gaining political support for forcing them to pay for improvements.

"The water is absolutely safe," said Chris Klose, spokesman for the American Crop Protection Association. "The study is without scientific merit, and it's damaging to the public trust."

Endangered Species Act protects steelhead trout

Associated Press

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — The federal government announced Endangered Species Act protections Monday for five populations of steelhead trout in Washington, Oregon, Idaho and California.

The listings take effect in 60 days, giving states time to forge conservation plans.

The National Marine Fisheries Service deferred for six months a decision on five other steelhead populations in western Oregon, north coastal California and California's Central Valley — saying scientists dispute the status of those stocks.

NMFS officials denied a last-minute request from California Gov. Pete Wilson's administration to delay listings until a multi-agency state task force has time to develop a protection plan for the fish.

"These fish are at serious risk of disappearing forever," said Terry Garcia, acting assistant secretary for oceans and atmosphere.

"We must take action now in order to restore these magnificent fish. Extinction is not an option."

Listed as "endangered," meaning they are at risk of becoming extinct in the foreseeable future, are steelhead in the upper Columbia River from the Yakima River upstream to Chief Joseph Dam in Washington, and in Southern California from the Santa Maria River to just south of Malibu Creek, north of Los Angeles.

Listed as "threatened," meaning they are likely to become endangered in the foreseeable future, are steelhead in the Snake River Basin — encompassing parts of Idaho, Washington, and Oregon — in the central California coast and the south-central California coast.

Specific ramifications of the listings will depend largely on detailed recovery plans that now must be developed by state and local officials, landowners and water districts, and approved by federal environmental regulators.

But the listing is certain to mean a ban on sport fishing for wild steelhead, requirements for fish screens on many streams where water is diverted for ranching and farming operations, and strict requirements for preserving habitat in the affected areas.

Barry McPherson, fishery restoration leader for the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife, said he didn't expect widespread shutdowns of steelhead fishing, most of which is for hatchery fish.

Small water districts that rely heavily on local water supplies are likely to face restrictions on diversions because of the listings.

Bob Vice, president of the California Farm Bureau Federation, said the federal government's actions would create a regulatory nightmare for some farmers but would give others hope that cooperation can head off further regulation.

Bruce Lovelin, spokesman for the Columbia River Alliance, a coalition of regional agricultural, industrial, utility and other water users, said the listings "could mean the cost of living and working in the Pacific Northwest will increase as the costs of electricity, food and other goods rise."

Steelhead, along with their cousins, the salmon, have been in decline for decades because of logging and development along stream beds, water diversions from stream habitats and hydroelectric dams.

In the Southern California area covered by the "endangered" listing, regulators estimate only 500 steelhead are left of a population that historically numbered 55,000. The upper Columbia River steelhead population numbered over 5,000; it is now estimated to be around 1,400.

In the Snake River Basin's threatened area, historic abundance of steelhead has fallen from more than 50,000 adult steelhead to fewer than 9,400.

And in the south-central California coast region, which includes the cities of Monterey and San Luis Obispo, fewer than 500 steelhead are estimated to remain of a population once approaching 25,000.

California Undersecretary for Resources Jim Branham said the Wilson administration was pleased that federal regulators deferred listing of stocks in central California and the north coast, areas where scientists dispute the numbers and habitat of steelhead.

As to the undisputed areas of steelhead decline, Branham said, "We've got a very sensitive effort underway.... We think we've probably got all the pieces in place that would make up an adequate conservation plan for the species."

Yellowstone fight for its native fish

By LAURA PERRETT
Universe Staff Writer

Yellowstone National Park is struggling to preserve its native fish species — the westslope cutthroat trout and the fluvial grayling.

"There is a big problem with lake trout in Yellowstone Lake," said Jack McIntyre, projects leader for the aquatic resource program.

Brook trout, brown trout, rainbow trout and other exotic species inhabit the Missouri River Basin and the native fish have to compete with these species for food, and many do not survive, he said. Another problem with the exotic species is that they breed with native fish, eliminating the chances for species preservation.

The native species, if preserved, are in an environment especially suited for them.

"The fish that are here in the park have adapted to the high elevation and wintertime conditions," Mahoney, fisheries biologist, have also adapted to particular in the stream and different b. Besides providing a special environment for native fish, Yellowstone home to many animals that native fish for food.

"If we're not successful in the cutthroat population stream there will be a problem with who depend on the fish for food."

Mahoney said grizzly bears, eagles and pelicans can eat cutthroat trout when they streams. "A lot of animals eat the fish," he said.

Many feel, however, that Yellowstone animals turned food sources, there would station to preserve the native fish.

"In my view, it is worth serve native fish species to the diversity of critters we have country," McIntyre said.

ATTENTION SEMINARY INSTRUCTORS

Would you like a map of the area where the people of the Book of Mormon really lived? a map that every one of your students will have with them in class?

(1 Nephi 13:13-19, 3 Nephi 21:4, Doctrine and Covenants, p.295) this map is where the Gentiles were established a free people, "by the power of the Father." Now turn to D&C p 296, This is where the (gospel) came forth. This is also whole area mentioned in the Book of Mormon.

Joseph Smith the prophet declared, the hill Cumorah in New York was and is the hill Cumorah, the place where the Jaredites and the Nephites were destroyed. Joseph Smith also named Lake Ontario the Eastern Seas.

Lehi's and Mulek's children scattered all over the Americas. However, those men, who handed the sacred records down those many generations were never more than 100 miles from the hill Cumorah, in Manchester County, New York.

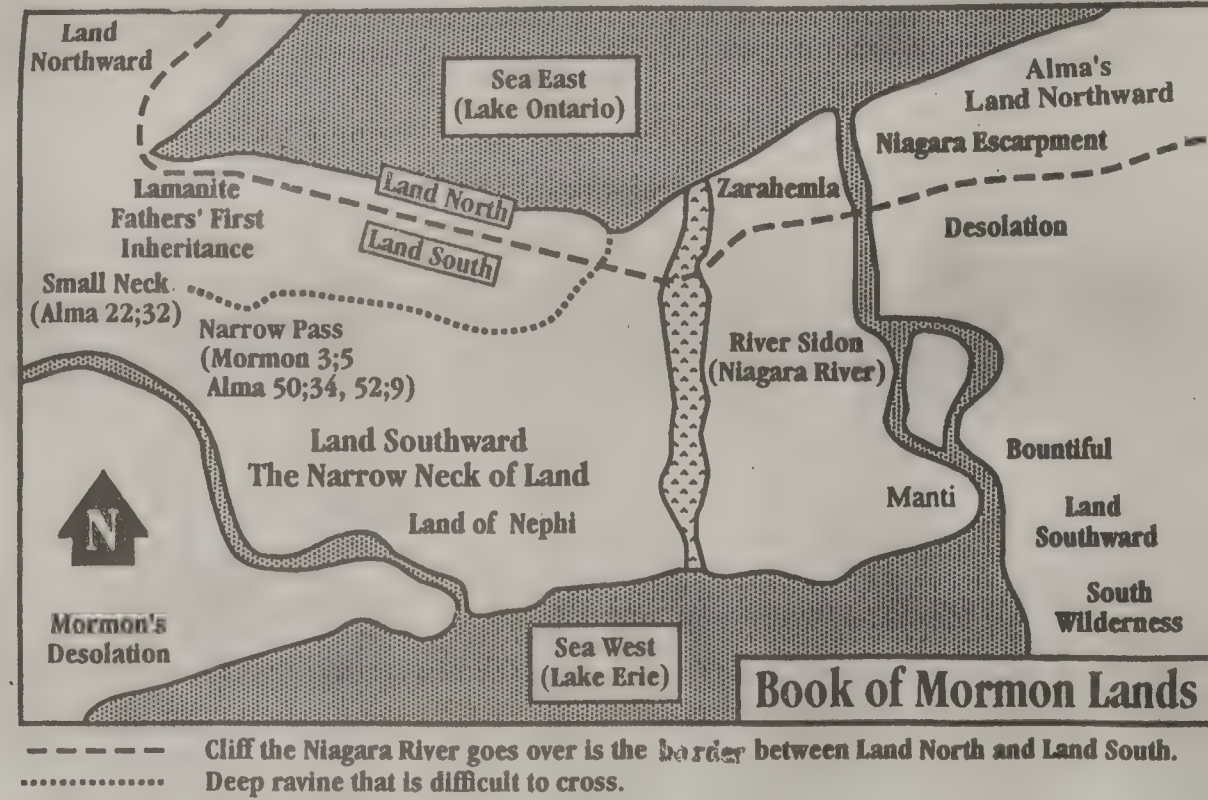

(Helaman 3:3-4, 8) The area of large bodies of water and many rivers is not shown on your map, however, they are the on the land. With Lake Ontario as the Sea East, Lake Erie must be the Sea West, Lake St. Clair the Sea South, and Lake Huron the Sea North. Mormon described one side of the Land Northward, came back to where he started (shown by comma and the word from) and described the other side.

The greatest cause for confusion is the names of the lands and seas. If the word land or sea is used with any direction that land or sea is named. As with the Sea North, or the Land Northward.

Also there are some lands that have a side land on both sides of the River Sidon. (Alma 22:29-30, 32). Alma's land Northward is on the east of Sidon along with bountiful, a Desolation, and they border each other. In (3) Bountiful is a day and a half from Desolation which divides the lands Northward and Southward.

A enlarged map of the narrow neck of land is needed to show the many landmarks and names on narrow neck of land or Land Southward which is the same place. A copy of that map is shown here.

The book CHRIST in NORTH AMERICA, Delbert W. Curtis will answer all questions, give all references, and remove all doubt. It is in the Bookstore.

Fatal fever spreads in Vietnam

Associated Press

HANOI, Vietnam — An outbreak of dengue fever has killed at least 90 people in Vietnam's Mekong delta, according to an official report.

More than 11,000 people living in five provinces in southern Vietnam have been infected with the dengue virus in the past month.

The worst hit was Tra Vinh province, 135 miles south of Ho Chi Minh City, where more than 5,000 people contracted dengue fever this year, triple the figure a year ago.

So far, 43 people in that province have been killed by internal bleeding caused by dengue, according to an official newspaper, Labor, which cited a report by the Mekong delta health service.

Dengue fever, a viral infection spread by mosquitoes, can cause death to those who get it twice.

Grand Canyon flash flood forces 400 to evacuate

Associated Press

SUPAI, Ariz. — Flooding that forced the evacuation of about 400 people from an American Indian reservation at the bottom of the Grand Canyon began subsiding Monday, but the problems were far from over.

Water and sewer lines on the Havasupai Indian Reservation were pummeled by logs, boulders and other debris when floodwaters raged on Sunday. There was no running water on Monday, and helicopters were being used to get water to residents who refused to leave.

About 200 residents remained in the canyon overnight, but many were expected to be flown out on Tuesday, said Don Washco of the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

He said it's expected to take three or four days to repair water-damaged utility lines.

Some 400 people were taken by helicopter out of the canyon by Monday afternoon. Most were residents, but about 100 tourists who were hiking, camping and rafting near the popular Havasu Falls were also evacuated.

Lester Crooke, Havasupai tribal chairman, said he saw the wall of water coming toward this village.

"It was really rushing through, bringing all kinds of big rocks and logs and whatever it can carry," he said.

He said electricity, water, sewer and telephone service all went down. The only working communication the tribe had with officials outside the canyon was one fax line and short-wave radios.

Electricity and water have since been restored.

The torrential rain dumped three to four inches on the area in just two hours.

As the water from neighboring creeks converged onto Cataract Creek, Crooke said residents could see the flood coming.

He and other officials got into a chartered helicopter to warn people downstream, some of whom were swimming because the water was clear and they had no indication that raging waters were coming.

"It just happened so fast we had to turn our alarms on so people would look and see the water coming," Crooke said.

He said several people were stranded on high ground and had to be rescued. Two people were caught in a tree about 8 feet off the ground and had to be thrown a rope from the helicopter, and two others were trapped in a cave at Havasu Falls.

Crooke could see a dozen kayaks and rafts flowing downstream with a variety of personal belongings.

Only one minor injury was reported, a 2-year-old boy struck by a horse

About 100 Red Cross volunteers headed to Peach Springs to staff a shelter for residents forced out of their homes.

Larry Agan, a Red Cross field supervisor, said about 75 residents were expected to spend the night at the shelter, while hundreds of others found refuge with friends and family.

Residents had to flee their homes with only the clothes they were wearing, and a few small personal items, he said.

USU rocket experiment takes an early landing

Associated Press

A Utah State University experiment was supposed to be carried into space to measure the properties of the atmosphere about 75 miles above the earth before splashing into the Atlantic Ocean.

But it ended up in the ocean earlier than planned, as the second stage of the rocket carrying the $100,000 experiment failed to fire and the rocket splashed into the ocean east of NASA's Wallops Island, Va., facility.

"The payload wasn't recovered and we don't know when we'll try again," said Mark Jensen, supervising engineer of the experiment, called the Chemistry of Odd Oxygen Rocket, or COORS.

He said NASA is investigating the failure in the Thursday morning launch and will report their findings.

"I imagine we'll have a preliminary report this week," Jensen said. "Sometimes these things take months though."

COORS was supposed to measure infrared radiation, nitric oxide, atomic oxygen and electron density in the atmosphere between 200,000 and 400,000 above the earth's surface.

Jensen said it was difficult to watch a year's work crash into the ocean.

"Anytime you work hard, overtime hours you feel bad. As a lab we feel bad for the people who put time into this," Jensen said. "That's the nature of the business. I'm sure NASA will learn something."

NASA spokesman Keith Koehler said this was the first failure after 92 successful operations dating back to March 7, 1994.

Another USU experiment, the Mesosphere-Thermosphere Emissions for Ozone Remote Sensing, or METEORS, was launched Thursday from White Sands, N.M., and gathered data for about five minutes before deploying its parachute and landing without damage.

VP: While still in office, Vice President Gore talks to students at Bret Hatre Intermediate School about attending college. Quayle is now traveling across the nation spreading his political ideas and possibly looking for a presidential voting pool.

Quayle considers candidacy

Associated Press

ATI — Former Vice President Dan Quayle said Monday he won't decide until after the 1999 election whether he is traveling all over the country to deliver a message that I will make to the American people.

At a reception for the message, then I obviously consider it and make the decision in 1999, accordingly," he said.

Quayle spoke at an Ohio Senate Republican Caucus fund-raising breakfast. He said Republicans in Congress should debate the White House more aggressively on budget priorities, without worrying about whether the government occasionally shuts down for lack of funding.

"I probably shouldn't say this, because it'll probably get me in a little bit of trouble, but it appears that the only person today that's willing to stand up to Bill Clinton is Paula Jones," Quayle said, drawing laughter from the crowd.

"Now, folks, let us return to the debate of the issues."

Ms. Jones is pursuing a lawsuit that accuses Clinton of asking her to perform a sex act in 1991 at a Little Rock, Ark., hotel while he was Arkansas governor. Clinton denies the allegations.

Clinton had no response to Quayle's remarks, White House spokeswoman Julia Payne said Monday.

For arrested assault party

Associated Press

ANGELES — Actor Slater was arrested after he allegedly bit a woman's stomach and then with officers as a rowdy ended into a brawl at a party.

Slater, 27, was booked for assault with a deadly weapon, Ron Phillips said.

Slater didn't describe the incident, which could range from a simple fight to a firearm and said he didn't know if bail had been responded to the 11th floor apartment through a window. He was taken into custody between the eighth and ninth floors and then scuffled with officers, Phillips said.

Slater wouldn't release other details about the confrontation.

Top executives resign in extortion scandal

Associated Press

TOKYO — Eleven executives of one of Japan's largest brokerages, Yamaichi Securities, resigned Monday, making it the nation's third major financial institution to lose top management in an extortion payoff scandal.

Yamaichi President Atsuo Miki and 10 other senior officials resigned over the scandal, following similar management upheavals at Nomura Securities, the nation's No. 1 brokerage, and Dai-ichi Kangyo Bank.

Several executives from Nomura and Dai-ichi Kangyo have been arrested in the scandal involving alleged payoffs and favors to Ryuichi Koike, who is in custody on extortion charges. Yamaichi is also being investigated by prosecutors, but no Yamaichi officials have been arrested.

Yamaichi also will shuffle and slim down its board of directors as part of its management shakeup. The decisions were made at a board meeting Monday.

The Yamaichi executives said their resignations were not an admission of personal guilt but a symbolic gesture, and they are to remain at Yamaichi as advisers.

Such demotions are common when scandals surface at Japanese companies and amount to a gesture of contrition for public relations damage suffered by the company, not an admission of guilt.

Yamaichi said in a statement it felt "deeply responsible" for the loss of public trust in the company and intended to cooperate with investigators.

It said an internal investigation had cleared Miki of wrongdoing, but did not say whether others were directly linked to the scandal.

Yamaichi is suspected of illegally funneling about $679,000 to Koike in 1995 to make up for trading losses he suffered.

Japanese corporate racketeers buy stock in target companies and threaten to raise embarrassing questions about executive sex scandals or business losses if not paid off. Doing business with them is illegal but commonplace in Japan.

Prosecutors raided the homes of top Yamaichi officials as well as the company's headquarters two weeks ago to seize evidence.

Last month, the Finance Ministry forced Nomura and Dai-ichi Kangyo to close some of their most profitable operations for five months — the harshest punishments ever dealt by the country's financial regulators.

Yamaichi said in a statement it felt "deeply responsible" for the loss of public trust in the company and intended to cooperate with investigators. ... Yamaichi is suspected of illegally funneling about $679,000 to Koike in 1995 to make up for trading losses he suffered.

Drug conspiracy busted; 89 arrested, cash seized

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Undercover operations aimed at Mexican drug runners resulted in 89 arrests in nine U.S. cities and the seizure of tons of cocaine and marijuana and millions in cash. The probes disclosed major new inroads by the Mexicans into the New York City market, officials said Monday.

The combined haul of two separate operations begun last fall: 11.4 tons of cocaine, 6.4 tons of marijuana and $18.5 million in cash. At least 28 people were arrested Monday alone.

"This is a tremendous conspiracy that reached all the way from Juarez, Mexico, to New York City and Westchester County," in the New York suburbs, said Thomas A. Constantine, administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

"This was brand-new to us," Constantine said. "For the first time, we saw the organized crime syndicates from Mexico actually bringing their own cocaine into the New York City area and selling it."

"These operations dramatically demonstrate that Mexican drug traffickers are displacing at least some of the Colombian cocaine organizations which have traditionally dominated the New York City market," he said.

He estimated that Mexican drug bosses now account for 30 percent to 35 percent of the cocaine distributed in the United States.

Law enforcement officials said the drug traffickers were associates of Amado Carrillo Fuentes, who until his death last month was considered Mexico's most powerful druglord.

A law enforcement official said the arrests included several non-Mexican truck drivers from Battle Creek, Mich., who allegedly hauled narcotics from Juarez, Mexico, and El Paso, Texas, in 18-wheeler trucks and brought back millions of dollars in cash.

The operation included the use of warehouses in the New York suburbs of New Rochelle and Pelham, said the official.

Winding up that operation, dubbed "Reciprocity," a joint task force composed of agents from the DEA, FBI and the U.S. Customs Service arrested 25 people Monday in New York, Battle Creek, El Paso and Albuquerque, N.M.

During the course of the investigation, an additional 13 people were arrested, including alleged drug runners in Tucson, Ariz., and Los Angeles.

The totals for Operation Reciprocity are 7.4 tons of cocaine, $11 million in cash, 2,700 pounds of marijuana and 41 arrests. Twenty eight of those arrests were made on Monday.

The official said those arrested include two alleged leaders of the Mexican drug distribution operation in the New York City area. One of them, Martin Manzo, was arrested Monday. The other, Alejandro Ortiz, was arrested earlier.

A second drug investigation, Operation Limelight, focused on a third cell of drug racketeers also linked to Carrillo, the late Mexican drug boss. The investigation opened last September and concentrated on the Chicago area, the official said. He said it resulted in the seizure of 4 tons of cocaine, 10,000 pounds of marijuana, $7.4 million in cash and 48 arrests.

Operation Reciprocity began last Oct. 30 with the seizure of $2 million in cash from a secret compartment in a van that had been stopped by a Texas state trooper in McAllen, Texas, a town at the Mexican border.

In a second event, a state and local police task force in Tucson, Ariz., responding to an anonymous call, seized 5.3 tons of cocaine at a local warehouse. Three El Paso residents were arrested.
